Contracts for Third Parties

IN 1947 the Inland Revenue unsuccessfully tried to persuade Mr Justice WYNN PARRY that they could levy estate duty on annuities payable to the two daughters of a deceased business man under an agreement made by him, to which the daughters were not parties (Re Miller's Agreement, Uniacke v. Attorney-General ([1947] Ch. 615)). His lordship held that since the daughters were not parties, they could not enforce payment of the annuities: therefore they did not have an 'interest' within the meaning of section 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act 1894.

Although this decision has been much criticized, it has been followed until now and a great many schemes to avoid estate duty have been founded on it. The principal critic of the Miller decision has been Lord DENNING. He criticized it in Smith and Snipes Hall Farm v. River Douglas Catchment Board ([1949] 2 K.B. 515) and in Drive Yourself Hire Co (London) Ltd ([1954] 1 Q.B. 250). He also dissented in the House of Lords in Scruttons Ltd v. Midland Silicones Ltd ([1962] 1 All E.R. 1) where his dicta in the two earlier cases were disapproved and the House then applied the principle that a person who is not a party to a contract cannot sue on it.

The matter has come up again in the Court of Appeal in Beswick v. Beswick, reported in The Times of June 23rd. The new decision is in some ways a startling one, in that it overrules Re Miller's Agreement, which has been followed so faithfully.

The facts were simple. PETER BESWICK had a coal round in which he was helped by his nephew, JOHN JOSEPH BESWICK. In 1962 PETER was over 70, had had a leg amputated, and was not very well. The nephew was anxious to take over the business. They went to a solicitor who drew up an agreement under which the nephew took the business at once, on terms that he paid PETER £6 10s a week for the rest of his life, and thereafter £5 a week to PETER's wife. The solicitor did not make her a party. PETER died in November 1963, so that the £5 a week to his widow then became payable. However, the nephew made only one £5 payment and refused to pay any more. The widow took out letters of administration and then sued the nephew both in her capacity as administratrix of PETER and in her capacity as the person entitled to the £5 a week. The Vice-Chancellor in the Lancashire Chancery Court dismissed her claim, applying Re Miller. She appealed successfully to the Court of Appeal consisting of Lord DENNING, Lord Justice DANCKWERTS and Lord Justice SALMON, who were unanimously in her favour. Moreover, they refused to give leave to the nephew to appeal to the House of Lords. He can still apply to the House itself for leave.

Lord DENNING said he upheld the widow's claim on two grounds. In the first place, as her husband's personal representative, she could enforce his contractual rights. Those rights included a right to require the payment of £5 a week to her in her personal capacity. The nephew had argued that the damages were nil, since the £5 a week did not go into the estate. However, the Court could order specific performance of an agreement to pay money. Once the money was paid, it belonged of course to the widow.

The second ground was section 56 of the Law of Property Act 1925, which reads:

'A person may take an immediate or other interest in land or other property . . . although he may not be named as a party to the conveyance or other interest.'

The word 'property' is defined in section 205 (xx) to include:

'any thing in action, and any interest in real or personal property.'

Mr Justice WYNN PARRY had said in Re Miller that section 56 was of assistance only where the person in question had a right independently of section 56.

Finally, Lord DENNING said that the general rule undoubtedly was that 'no third person can sue, or be sued, on a contract to which he is not a party'. However, at bottom that was only a rule of procedure going to the form of the remedy, not to the underlying right. The action had to be brought in the name of the contracting party. We would say here that this is surely a remarkable state of affairs. The efforts of the reformers for years past has been to remove slavish adherence to forms of action and to have regard only to the underlying rights. It seems pointless to retain a rule about procedure if the underlying right is to be established in this way.

Lord DENNING said he understood the desire of Mr Justice WYNN PARRY to save the daughters from having to pay estate duty but he could not subscribe to the way the judge did it. In the present case it is obvious where one's sympathies must lie, but 'hard cases make bad law'.

Accountants' Salaries Survey

IT is a commonplace that there is no lack of demand for the younger qualified accountant. Both industry and practising firms are openly competing for his services. Yet this is true of most professions, whether it be solicitors, architects, statisticians or any other.

Some indication of the relationship between the supply of qualified accountants and the demand for their services is provided by a recent survey carried out by Reed Executive Ltd, a firm of staff selection consultants. According to their findings the level of salaries increased during the past twelve months by as much as 15 per cent for some groups, and in general 'beyond the national average increase of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent during 1965'.

The report comments that this is merely the continuation of recent trends, asserting that the 'majority of accountants have increased their salaries over the last five years by around £1,000 . . .'. Substantial pay increases are recorded over a wide age band, i.e. from qualification in the early twenties to the early forties, but the survey does note that there is some falling away in this progression after the fortieth birthday. The newly-qualified men have enjoyed substantial increases but, as the report notes, a large part of those increases merely represents the fact of qualification. It comments that 'industry has not yet adjusted its salary levels to attract newly-qualified people from the profession' which, in recent years, has noticeably increased the rewards available to the younger entrant.

An analysis of the data reveals that some groups have apparently done better than others. The fact that new members of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants have enjoyed 'very substantial' salary increases is noted with the comment that the 'modal salary at age 28 has risen during the twelve months ended in March from £1,500 to £1,700'.

Such survey results need, however, to be interpreted with some caution even though in their main findings they do reflect the current situation. To start with, the survey was carried out solely among qualified members of the various professional bodies who were contemplating changing their jobs. Second, of the 3,000 persons sampled, barely 25 per cent returned the questionnaire. It is hardly possible to judge whether it was the more successful or less successful who responded. There is also the fact that many of those who were contemplating a change of job were currently earning what they believed to be below the full market rate and, on obtaining a new appointment, would get a larger-than-average increment.

FINANCE BILL

Committee Stage on Corporation Tax

ALTHOUGH the Finance Act 1965 introduced corporation tax in a somewhat retrospective manner, it did not commit itself to stating the rate. This year the Government have taken their courage in both hands and stated the rate not only for 1964-65 but also for 1965-66. The CHANCELLOR forecast 35 per cent with 40 per cent as the outside maximum. Clause 24 (1) of the Finance Bill, which reached the Committee stage on June 21st, sets the rate at 40 per cent.

Not unnaturally there were Opposition attempts to reduce this rate but they were all in vain. Moving a reduction, Mr IAIN MACLEOD pointed out that the Financial Statement laid before the House on Budget Day estimated the corporation tax yield, both before and after the Budget changes, at £1,000 million. He asked for a full explanation of why the Government had abandoned the 35 per cent which had been bandied about so much.

The Government's reply, delivered by Mr JOHN DIAMOND, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, was a startling one. He said that included in the £1,000 million estimate was £575 million for Schedule F tax. This £575 million was only eleven-twelfths of a full year, because of the month's time-lag in collecting the Schedule F. Thus something like £50 million, or one month's Schedule F was not going to be collected in the financial year. This was 5 per cent of the total £1,000 million. Therefore this justified adding a corresponding 5 per cent to the corporation tax rate, increasing it from 35 to 40 per cent. In vain did the Opposition point out that increasing the 35 per cent rate by 5 per cent brought it up to  $36\frac{3}{4}$  per cent, not 40 per cent. Mr DIAMOND did not seem to be able to grasp this simple point. If that is the way the Government's mind works, one need no longer wonder why the legislation is couched in such extraordinarily incomprehensible terms, nor why Mr DIAMOND goes on insisting that the legislation is quite simple. Never before can a politician have turned 5 per cent into 14 per cent with such bland assurance.

Another failed attempt by the Opposition was to accord partnership treatment, i.e. exemption from corporation tax, to a company which does not have more than ten shareholders. A member suggested that otherwise companies might turn themselves into limited partnerships. Mr DIAMOND said the latest statistics showed no remarkable increase in the number of limited partnerships. In any event, that was a matter for the Board of Trade; it was open to companies to become partnerships if they wanted to. If they stayed as companies they would have to pay corporation tax.

The Opposition pointed out a flaw in paragraph 20 of Schedule 15 to the Finance Act, 1965, which deals with loss set-off relief under section 341 in the transition period. If a company is being assessed on the current year basis for 1965-66 it seems that, as paragraph 20 is drawn at present, capital allowances cannot be included in the claim but must be carried forward. Mr DIAMOND undertook to introduce an amendment at the Report stage.

A perfectly reasonable suggestion was made that as chargeable gains and income are all lumped together in the case of companies, and charged at the full corporation tax rate, then any corresponding losses should be available for general set-off. This would replace the present artificial restriction of relief for losses, whereby losses on capital assets are available only against chargeable gains, losses on Case VI account only against Case VI income, and so on. When one bears in mind that losses cannot in any event be carried back, the scope for hardship is very wide. Suppose a company exists for one year; makes a trading profit of £20,000 and loses £20,000 in a Case VI transaction, then it will have to pay £800 tax although its net profit is nil.

Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1965 contains special group treatment provisions in relation to chargeable gains. The groups in question are groups in the profits tax sense. The provisions are confined to resident companies which are companies within the meaning of the Companies Act 1948 (or the corresponding Northern Ireland enactment) and to registered industrial and provident societies. Paragraph 15 of Schedule 4 to the new Bill extends the scope to companies (resident in the United Kingdom) which were formed under the law of a country outside the United Kingdom. This apparently still leaves out chartered companies. The Opposition moved an amendment to bring them in. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY admitted that the question of chartered companies had never been brought to the Government's attention before. There might be other cases, such as companies formed under a private Act or by letters patent. He gave an undertaking to introduce the Government's own amendment at the report stage. What was not mentioned in the debate was the fact that in the profits tax provisions in section 42 of the Finance Act 1938, the test is the proportion of the 'ordinary share capital' which one company owns in another. Schedule 13 provides that in the case of an industrial and provident society the share capital is to be treated as ordinary share capital. It would be quite possible for chartered and other special kinds of companies not to have any ordinary share capital. Consequently any extension in the kinds of companies covered should be accompanied by consequential provisions about how the group relationship is to be defined.

There were Opposition suggestions that paragraph 9 (1) (a) (c) of Schedule 11 to the Finance Act 1965 should be amended so as to convert the complete disallowance for interest and patent royalties into a disallowance of the amount by which the payment represented more than a reasonable commercial consideration. A powerful case was made out and was supported, in relation to patent royalties, by Sir LIONEL HEALD who is an expert on patents. However, the plea was rejected by the CHIEF SECRETARY on what seem to be somewhat specious grounds. As regards disallowing interest paid by close companies, he founded this on the fact that:

'there is nothing whatever to prevent a person who is putting up share capital describing it as loan capital. Therefore, the whole or the greater part of what would go as dividend on shares goes as interest on loan. Even if the rate of loan was 1 per cent below the market price, the point would still be the same.'

This seems to ignore the fact that paragraph 9 (1) (a) does not disallow all interest, it disallows interest which is paid to two classes of persons (i) a director-participator, and (ii) a person who is an associate of a director-participator. A participator as such can be paid interest. On the other hand, a person who is considering whether or not to come into the company can still either lend money to it or take shares in it. If he merely lends money, and is not an associate of a director-participator, the interest is deductible; if he takes shares, the dividends are not deductible. The CHIEF SECRETARY seems to have got his line of demarcation completely wrong. In particular, non-close companies are taking full advantage of the fact that paragraph 9 does not apply to them.

On the question of payments for the use of patents and other intangible property, paragraph 9 (1) (c) disallows all such payments to a participator or an associate of a participator. Here the CHIEF SECRETARY rested his argument on the difficulty of agreeing the reasonable commercial consideration and objected that there would be endless references to the Commissioners and the Courts. He seems to have forgotten that the capital gains tax legislation bristles with provisions about taking the market value of practically every conceivable kind of property including of course patents. This applies not only for close companies but for everybody who disposes of property.

And why should they disallow patent royalties to an inventor merely because his grandfather owns a single share in the company paying the royalties? It is clear that the Government's obsession with tax avoidance has made them throw equity out of the window.

A Government supporter moved an amendment to modify section 74 of the Finance Act 1965, which restricts allowable directors' remuneration by a close company. He suggested that the special standard for full-time directors be £5,000 per director up to a maximum of £20,000. Certainly this salary is small compared with salaries paid to members of the Government. Here again Mr DIAMOND used a specious argument to resist the change. He said the £20,000 would compare with £13,000 a year ago and £9,000 two years ago. By using the £9,000 figure he was referring to the profits tax limit. He went on to say that the £20,000 would therefore represent a doubling of the £9,000 in only two years. What he did not say was that the £9,000 for profits tax was not fixed in 1964, as he implied, but five years earlier. Moreover, the profits tax restrictions on directors' remuneration were confined to companies controlled by their directors. Furthermore, the profits tax rate was not 40 per cent but 10 per cent. Finally, the possibility of qualifying as a whole-time service director was much greater under profits tax legislation. All these points were made by the Opposition but without avail.

The House then moved on to the fantastic complications of section 85 of the Finance Act 1965, and clause 26 of the new Bill which seeks to undo the damage to the Revenue caused by the defective drafting of amendments to the 1965 Bill. Clause 26 as originally drafted covers more than a page, and is accompanied by Schedule 6 which covers more than three pages. Even so, further drafting deficiencies have been discovered and further amendments had to be moved in Committee on the Government's behalf. Broadly speaking the object of clause 26 is to prevent groups of companies from obtaining excessive Schedule F relief in respect of dividends paid out of past profits.

There then followed a long debate on clause 27 which represents the Government's speedy reaction to attempts by astute people to turn to advantage the tax exemptions of friendly societies. The clause is accompanied by a two-part schedule covering nearly three pages. Part I imposes additional conditions for tax exemption on certain business of friendly societies, Part II amends the Friendly Societies Acts. Both clause and schedule were the subject of Government amendments, and there was a total of some three hours' debate, all in the early hours of June 22nd. In the same sitting the rest of the corporation tax clauses were dealt with. No doubt some of them will come up again on report.

Current Affairs

New Tax Reserve Certificates

A NEW Tax Reserve Certificate for companies only has been introduced as from Monday of this week, June 27th. The new certificate can be used for payment of corporation tax, and any remaining liability to profits tax, due from the certificate holder, and as foreshadowed in the Chancellor's Budget speech it will offer better terms than existing certificates. Interest will be at a rate of  $4\frac{3}{8}$  per cent per annum tax-free, equivalent to a gross return of £7 5s 10d per cent, subject to corporation tax at the present rate of 40 per cent.

At the same time there is an issue of Personal Tax Reserve Certificates for use in payment of income tax, surtax and capital gains tax due from individuals, partnerships, trusts and other bodies of persons not liable to corporation tax. Interest will be at a rate of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent tax free equivalent to a gross return of £5 19s 1d per cent for holders paying income tax at 8s 3d. This is the same as the yield on the present (9th) issue of Tax Reserve Certificates.

In general the conditions governing the use of the new certificates are the same as for the present issue, but the opportunity is being taken to make a number of small changes and to clarify the wording of the prospectus. Application forms and copies of the new prospectuses are available from all offices of Inland Revenue Collectors of Taxes and from most banks in the United Kingdom.

The new Tax Reserve Certificate for companies has been introduced to take account of the change in company taxation. Now that corporation tax at 40 per cent has taken the place of income tax plus profits tax (equivalent to  $56\frac{1}{2}$  per cent) the gross yield of current certificates held by companies is less. The tax free rate has therefore been raised to bring their gross yield into line with those on comparable securities.

Stock Exchange Requirements

THE London Stock Exchange's requirements for admission of securities to quotation have been stiffened in recent years and now there has been issued a new Memoranda of guidance and requirements of the Federation of Stock Exchanges in Great Britain and Ireland. This means that all stock exchanges will now operate under one set of quotation rules and regulations.

There are a number of new requirements, the principal being that which deals with the disclosure of directors' interests, directly and through trusts, and also in holdings in subsidiary companies. A statement of directors' transactions in the equity capital will have to be available for inspection for a period before the annual meeting but this does not extend to transactions by executives.

Turnover figures are called for 'wherever possible' and provisions have been made for transfers and other documents to be registered without fee. A twenty-one-day limit is set on the provision of share certificates after lodgement of transfers, with the limit (currently thirty days) coming down to fourteen days at the beginning of 1969. Provision of two-way proxies, availability of service contracts for inspection and demand for more detailed information on take-over or merger operations are among other provisions. The new requirements are intended to come into operation at the beginning of September.

Industry's Investment Intentions

DURING May, the Board of Trade asked companies contributing to its investment intentions inquiries to state whether they planned to spend in 1966 and 1967 more or less than they had forecast in the November-December 1965 inquiry. The latter inquiry had led to estimates that manufacturing industry seemed likely to spend very little more on fixed assets in 1966 than in 1965 - a rise of up to about 2 per cent was indicated - and that the distributive and service industries expected to spend about the same in 1966 as in 1965; both manufacturers and the distributive and service trades envisaged plans for spending about the same in 1967 as this year.

The results of the May inquiry suggest that companies, both in manufacturing industry and in the distributive and service trades, now expect to spend on capital account in 1966 and in 1967 less than they had planned to spend at the end of last year. This particular inquiry was only the third of its kind, and as contributors were asked to indicate only whether they intended to spend more than, the same as, or less than they had declared at the end of last year, and did not call for revised estimates of intended capital expenditure, the Board states that it is not possible to give an indication of the amount of the reduction implied by the results.

Later in the summer the Board will be asking companies to provide up-to-date forecasts of their capital expenditure in 1966 and 1967.

The Telephone Service

THERE are few issues on which critics are quite so unanimous as on the state of the U.K. telephone service. In a new Hobart Paper (No. 36) from the Institute of Economic Affairs, entitled Telephones - Public or Private? (7s 6d), an American, Mr Michael Canes, reviews critically the circumstances which have brought the present situation about and puts forward some proposals for a new service.

He documents, as far as the statistics permit, the evidence on quality of service; he criticizes Treasury control over the capital expenditure programmes of the G.P.O., and the confusion between the provision of an efficient commercial service and a social service. He is strongly opposed to the present cartelized system of providing G.P.O. equipment. In general, comments Mr Canes, the G.P.O. 'is well insulated both from expert surveillance and from public scrutiny'.

Among proposals for reform the author advocates the separation of the telephone service from the postal services of the G.P.O. In addition it is suggested that

by An Industrious Accountant

HE was tall and kindly, with snow white hair curling thinly over the back of his coat collar. This hirsute appearance denoted the mild eccentricity of age rather than the slovenly carelessness of youth, because at 64 years he felt free to indulge his whims. He looked rather like a reincarnation of Mr Chips and sure enough he was hailed throughout the store as Chippy, a friendly nickname which he accepted as a tribute to the oldest accountant on the staff.

He had served in every section of the accounts department over the years, without ever achieving senior status, a sad come-down for the young man who had once been hailed as a future managing director. Recurrent illness following shell-shock at El Alamein, plus the financial burden of keeping a permanently crippled brother, had worn him down. For several years he'd had a sinecure as third-floor cashier, where pressure was light, but his time was running out.

So it came as no surprise when at length Chippy asked for an appointment to discuss his impending retirement. Our pension scheme provides for termination of service on the 65th birthday, and his long employment with us ensured the maximum allowable amount for him. He sat smiling tiredly while I suggested a suitable time-table for departure for him, then he suddenly sprang his surprise. He was getting married next Saturday; he wanted to invite me to the wedding.

Delighted that he'd found a helpmate to look after him in his declining years, I congratulated him and gladly accepted the invitation. . . . But something was amiss somewhere. Not because such a life-long bachelor had at last been courting; not because the bride-to-be was poor, elderly and rather cantankerous; not indeed because her face, alas, would never launch a thousand ships . . . the penny dropped. What about his health?

Our pension scheme provides rather well for widows of deceased staff, allocating to them a proportion of the annual remuneration earned by their late spouses. It has one restrictive clause, however, dating from the complex, legal fight of a long-gone day when a doting director died of a heart-attack at his wedding breakfast, leaving a far from disconsolate young relict. It reads to the effect that no widow is entitled to a pension unless she had married the said employee prior to the commencement of his last sickness and prior to his leaving our employment. Chippy had been fit and well for some time now, but he looked suddenly very fragile; could he have some new undisclosed weakness?

'Nonsense, nonsense, I assure you', he insisted, striking his chest with his bony fist, very lightly, like a cautious Tarzan. 'Fit as the proverbial fiddle. Haven't had a day's sickness for years; the last absences were influenza, of course'. His eyes stared as if he could mesmerize me into believing him.

Well, the wedding went off merrily, and his Maggie never looked better. He seemed stricken himself, however. 'I should have asked her long ago; she's been cheated of all these years', he muttered to me quietly. 'Anyhow if I should go suddenly she'll have the bit of pension to help her; at least I've had time to do that much'.

Had he indeed decided to move fast to ensure his new bride's annual income, before time or strength failed him suddenly, and to make up to her at last for the barren years of waiting? If so, it was hard to feel indignant at his philanthropic duplicity . . . perhaps the problem would arise when the pension committee queried, as its procedure ordained, whether his last sickness had commenced before his hasty marriage . . . perhaps we shouldn't probe too deeply to find the answer.

After all, a good accountant makes provision for future known contingencies, in order to safeguard his assets, and plans to maximize the yield on his investment. As Chippy and his Maggie drove off on the honeymoon from which he was not to return, he looked every inch a credit to his profession.

the service be supplied on a regional basis and that its control should be transferred to a professional manager and not a politician on his way up.

Management Information

PUBLISHED this week (Friday) – first in the English Institute's new 'Management Information' series of booklets – is Business Planning and Control, by Mr S. V. Bishop, M.C., F.C.A., the new managing director of the British Printing Corporation. Mr Bishop, whose appointment to the British Printing Corporation was announced in May, takes up his new post officially on the same day as his book is published. He joins B.P.C. from F. Perkins Ltd, the Peterborough diesel engine manufacturers, and has been associated with Perkins and Massey Ferguson of Toronto for many years.

Business Planning and Control is a 108-page book, with fifteen appendices showing detailed examples of the approaches suggested in the text. The full series of eight works is to be published over the coming months by the General Education Trust for The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. The second booklet, Research and Development – the Key to Tomorrow's Profit, by Mr J. Bullock, A.C.A., A.C.W.A., and Mr F. C. de Paula, T.D., F.C.A., F.C.W.A., is due later in July. The booklets, at 10s each, are available both to members of the Institute and the general public.

Parliamentary Questions

THE President of the Board of Trade is being asked by Mr Patrick Jenkin (Cons, Wanstead and Woodford) in the Commons on July 7th, what consultations he intends to hold with representatives of industry, the professions and financial institutions on his proposals for reforming company law.

Another question by the same member to the First Secretary of State, Mr George Brown, calls for a statement on the extent to which the Government have now reviewed with industry the use of clauses providing for the automatic adjustment of prices to wage increases in contracts for printing and for other goods and services.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is being asked on July 5th, by Mr John Smith (Cons, Cities of London and Westminster) how much money has so far been collected in capital gains tax, and what has been the cost of assessing and collecting it.

Bonus Issues of Shares or Debentures

by T. J. SOPHIAN

WHERE a shareholder receives bonus shares or debentures, the length of time during which he has held the original shares is material for the purpose of assessing him to the charge, whether under short-term, i.e. income tax under Case VII, or the long-term, i.e. capital gains tax.

The provisions in Schedule 9, paragraph 10 (2), (6), of the Finance Act 1962, reproduced for Case VII, were originally in Schedule 7, paragraph 4 (2), (6), of the 1965 Act; but paragraph 10 (6) will be retrospectively repealed from the very commencement of the capital gains tax (Schedule 9 paragraph 8 of the Bill), and is replaced by a new provision, paragraph 5 of Schedule 9. This new provision treats a disposal of the rights alone apart from the original shares to which they attach as a capital distribution within paragraph 3 of Schedule 7, of the 1965 Act. In substance the effect is that there is a notional part disposal of such part of the original shares as could have been purchased in the market at the time of the disposal for the sum received for the rights.

The Case VII position, however, is not affected and different rules will therefore apply depending on whether the disposal takes place within or outside the relative time limits. For the new short-term gains that limit is twelve months. The position with regard to bonus issues (i.e. without any consideration being given), is examined in this article, firstly as to short-term and secondly long-term.

1. SHORT-TERM

The cardinal rule for this purpose is that the bonus shares or debentures and the original shares constitute a single new holding and are treated as the same asset, acquired as the original shares were acquired, i.e. acquired at the same time and in the same manner (as, for example, by way of gift or as a beneficiary under a will) and, in the case of a bonus issue, as if the consideration given for the original shares extended to the bonus shares or debentures as well.

Example 1

Thus, for instance, A bought on May 1st, 1965, 2,000 £1 XY Ltd shares for £2,000. In March 1966, within the twelve months' period, XY Ltd made a bonus issue of one for two. A takes up the allotment and receives an additional 1,000 £1 XY Ltd shares (which need not be of the same class). A is now treated as holding 3,000 £1 XY Ltd shares as if they had all been bought by him on May 1st, 1965, for £2,000. If A sells any of these shares before May 1st, 1966, the transaction (i.e. the sale) would be chargeable to income tax (and surtax) as a short-term Case VII transaction; but if on the other hand, A bided his time and did not sell until after the expiry of twelve months after May 1st, 1965, the transaction would be long-term and any gain would be charged to capital gains tax at the rate of not more than 6s in the £ (30 per cent) and even perhaps less, if the alternative basis applied, and the method of computation would also differ. Perhaps the simplest type of case as far as the calculation is concerned, may be illustrated by the following example.

The 3,000 shares, the new holding, will be treated as having cost £2,000. Suppose A sells within twelve months 1,500 of these shares (whether the old or the new) for £1,250, their cost would be  $\frac{1}{2} \times £2,000 = £1,000$ , and the gain would be £250 (i.e. £1,250 - £1,000 = £250). It is assumed, of course, in this example, that the old and the new shares have the same quotations in the market and accordingly do not vary in price. The position where there is a variation is considered later.

Second rule

The next important rule is that the (bonus) rights as such must be treated as if they were the bonus shares themselves.

In the rare case where the shareholder does nothing at all about his allotment letter and neither accepts the allotment nor sells his rights, this rule would not apply.

A shareholder who receives an allotment letter has more than one course open to him. He can accept the letter and take up his bonus shares and/or debentures. Alternatively, he might sell his original shares ex-rights, or he might sell the rights themselves and retain his original shares without the rights to the bonus. If he sold the shares cum-rights, then his position would be as stated in the previous example, assuming again that the same market price is quoted for both original and bonus shares.

Let us now examine the alternative situations referred to above.

Example 2

Sale ex-rights

Taking the first example, suppose that A accepts the allotment letter but sells all his original 2,000 shares ex-rights for £1,500, so that the 1,000 £1 XY Ltd bonus shares are ultimately allotted to him.

Assume now that the market price of the original shares at this time is 15s per share, and the market price of the retained bonus shares by him is 16s per share.

The first step in the calculation is to ascertain the total market values of all the shares in the new holding. These are as follows:

2,000 £1 XY Ltd original shares at 15s each	..	£1,500
1,000 £1 XY Ltd bonus shares at 16s each	..	800
Total value	.. .. .	£2,300

The second step is to ascertain the proportion of the value of the shares sold (in this case the original shares, i.e. £1,500) to the total (£2,300) viz.:

$$\frac{£1,500}{£2,300} = \frac{15}{23}$$

The third step is to apply this proportion to the total cost of the new holding:

$$£2,000 \times \frac{15}{23} = (\text{approximately}) £1,307.$$

Thus, the apportioned cost of the whole holding in relation to the 2,000 original shares sold ex-rights is £1,307.

The fourth step is to deduct the apportioned cost from the £1,500 received on the sale of the 2,000 original shares ex-rights. A's gain, therefore, is £1,500 - £1,307 = £193.

Example 3

Sale of rights alone

If the above principles are borne in mind, the calculation where the bonus rights alone are disposed of and the original shares are retained is a simple one, for the same basic steps are to be taken.

Suppose A retained his 2,000 original £1 shares and disposed of the rights to the £1,000 bonus shares alone for £800.

The three material figures are known: (1) total market values, £2,300; (2) market value of the 2,000 original shares, £1,500; (3) market value of the bonus rights, £800.

The denominator will be the same £2,300, but for the numerator the figure of £800 (bonus rights) must be substituted for £1,500 (original shares), for it is the bonus rights this time which are being sold alone.

Therefore, the proportion of the £2,000 cost to be apportioned to the bonus rights would be  $\frac{£800}{£2,300} = \frac{8}{23}$ .

The apportioned cost, therefore, would be  $\frac{8}{23} \times £2,000 = (\text{approximately}) £690$ .

Accordingly the gain on the sale of the bonus rights alone would be £800 - £690 = £110.

These basic principles apply equally where the shareholder takes the new shares up and then sells part of his 'new holding', and the original shares and the bonus shares are quoted at different prices, say, as follows (taking the same figures used in the previous examples):

2,000 original shares at 15s each	..	..	1,500
1,000 bonus shares at 16s each	..	..	800
Total market value	..	..	£2,300

If A sold his 2,000 original shares there would be a similar calculation and apportionment as in Example 2 and his gain would be £193. If, on the other hand, he sold his 1,000 bonus shares, the calculation would be as in Example 3, and the gain would be £110.

These examples all emphasize that the 'rights' are to be treated as if they were the shares themselves issued.

Example 4

To render the position slightly more complicated, assume that the bonus issue consisted of 500 £1 shares and 500 £1 debentures; so that the total cost of the 2,000 £1 shares bought for £2,000 would also notionally include the bonus shares and debentures.

Here again one must determine the respective market values. Assume that the market values at the time of disposal was as follows:

2,000 original £1 shares	..	..	2,250
500 £1 bonus shares	..	..	525
500 £1 debentures	..	..	500
			£2,775

Then the apportioned costs (of £2,000) would be:

(a) if the 2,000 original shares were sold  $\frac{2,250}{2,775} \times £2,000$

(b) if the 500 bonus shares were sold  $\frac{525}{2,775} \times £2,000$

(c) if the 500 debentures were sold  $\frac{500}{2,775} \times £2,000$

The gain would be determined by deducting the apportioned costs in each case from the respective amounts received on the sales of the 2,000 original shares, the 500 bonus shares, and the 500 bonus debentures.

II. LONG-TERM

The long-term position would be the same as for short-term, except where the shareholder disposed of his rights alone, and apart from his original shares.

The short-term rules which, prior to the 1966 Finance Bill, would have applied to the computation where rights alone were disposed of, have been swept away in toto, and replaced by paragraph 5 of Schedule 9 which, moreover, has retrospective effect and will operate as for the year 1965-66 and following years. Paragraph 8 will apply not only where the rights are bonus, but also where the shareholder has to give any consideration for the rights.

The new paragraph 5 treats the disposal of the rights as if the sum received therefor was a capital distribution within paragraph 3 of Schedule 7 of the 1965 Act. There is, therefore, a notional disposal of such part of the original shares in respect of which the bonus rights attach as could be acquired in the market for the sum received for the rights.

But for this alteration, the long-term computation would have been the same as for short-term and would have been made exactly in accordance with the examples given above. Let us see how the relevant examples as to disposal of bonus rights alone would now work out under this new basis.

The discretion under paragraph 3 (2) of Schedule 7 of the 1965 Act to postpone the charge, where small amounts are involved, should be noted.

Example 5

A acquired 2,000 XY shares for £2,000. Thirteen months later there is a bonus issue of 1 for 2, i.e. of an additional 1,000 shares.

A now sells his bonus rights for £800. At that date the market value of the 2,000 original shares is £1,500. One must therefore determine how many of the original shares could have been purchased in the market for this sum of £800.

The number would be  $\frac{1,500}{2,000} \times 800 = 600$  shares.

A is deemed therefore to have sold a part of his holding, viz., 600 shares for £800. The part disposal then makes the apportionment fraction  $\frac{A}{A+B}$  in paragraph 7 of Schedule 6 applicable.

'A', the consideration received for the rights, is £800. 'B', the market value for the remaining 1,400 shares at 15s per share, is £2,100. The consideration for the original 2,000 shares is £2,000. Then the portion of the cost of £2,000 to be allocated to the 800 shares is:

$$£2,000 \times \frac{800}{800 + 2,100} = \text{approximately } £538.$$

The gain on the disposal of the rights is £800 - £538 = £262. The remaining 1,400 shares now have a new (apportioned) notional cost imprinted on them, viz, £2,000 - £538 = £1,462.

In relation to any subsequent disposal of the 1,400 shares, now notionally treated as the only shares remaining in the 'pool', or of any part of them, the notional cost of the whole pool (1,400 shares) would be £1,462.

Note: This article deals only with bonus issues. Different calculations have to be made in the case of rights issues, in the strict sense, where consideration has to be paid for the 'rights'.

The Watchdog in Whitehall

by RUDOLPH ROBERT, A.C.I.S.

JUST a century has now elapsed since the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act came into force, on June 28th, 1866. Its purpose was to 'consolidate the duties of the Exchequer and Audit Departments, to regulate the receipt, custody, and issue of public moneys and to provide for the audit of the accounts thereof'. An important feature of the Act was the appointment of a Comptroller and Auditor-General and of an Assistant Comptroller and Auditor for auditing the public accounts.

Both the Auditor-General and the Assistant Auditor (to shorten their titles) held their offices on a permanent basis, 'during good behaviour' vide section IV of the Act, subject, however, to removal by Her Majesty on an address from the two Houses of Parliament. The same section debars them from holding other Crown offices and from sitting as members of the House of Commons. 'Nor shall any peer of Parliament be capable of holding either of the said offices.'

The position of Assistant Comptroller and Auditor, it may be said straight away, was abolished as from March 31st, 1922, and so calls for no further comment.

Power and duties

The historical beginnings of the Audit Department go back to the times when Parliament first wrestled with the Crown for control of the national purse-strings. By 1866 the struggle had long since been decided in favour of Parliament, which nevertheless continued to feel the need for a 'watchdog' in Whitehall to ensure that its decisions were duly carried out.

For details of the present-day duties of the Auditor-General it is necessary to read both the Act of 1866 and the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act of 1921. The former empowers him to have free access at all times to the books and documents of the various departments whose accounts he is required to audit. Section 1 of the 1921 Act provides that he shall examine the Appropriation Account (i.e. the accounts of the Army, Navy, and Air Force and the Civil Departments) on behalf of the House of Commons, and in carrying out that examination shall satisfy himself that the money expended has been applied for the specific purpose(s) for which the Parliamentary grants were intended to provide.

That, in itself, is a formidable task. The law, however, lays on the Auditor-General the further obligation of examining the Consolidated Fund accounts covering expenditure for which annual Parliamentary sanction is not required, and the receipts of revenue by the departments of Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue and the Post Office, and the accounts of 'every receiver of money which is by law payable into the Exchequer' in order to verify the assessment, collection, and proper allocation of revenue.

The Auditor-General is required, moreover, to satisfy himself that any regulations or procedures in force are being duly carried out. Having completed his examinations he must report to the House of Commons which remains the final arbiter on all matters of State finance.

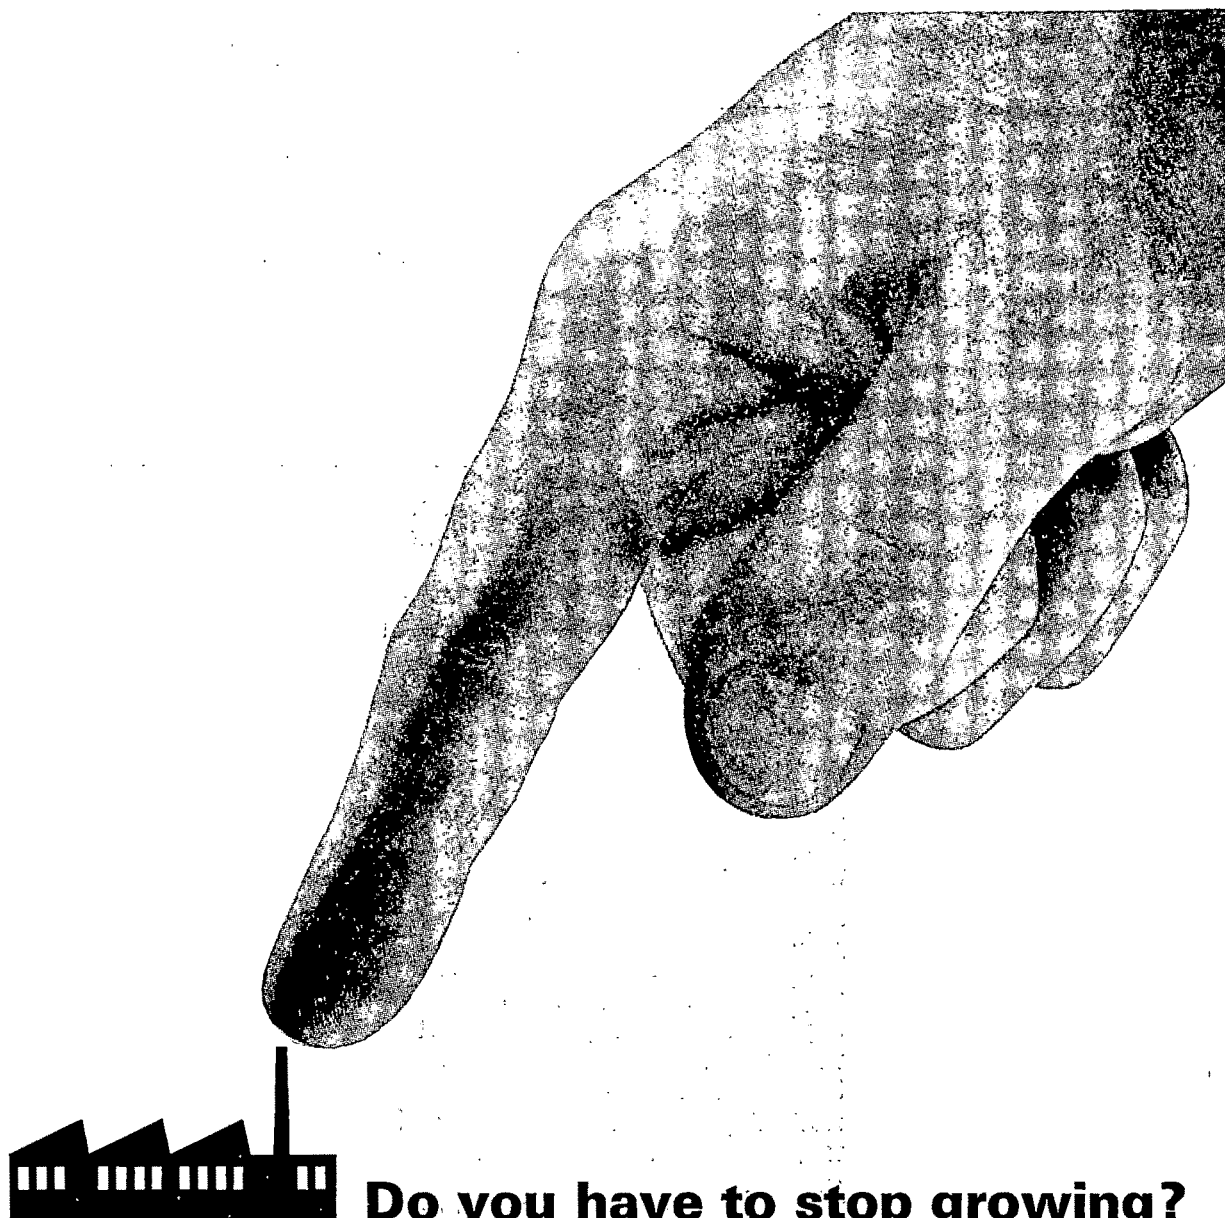

Various other duties fall upon the Auditor-General, as, for example, the examination, if so required by the Treasury, of the accounts of all principal accountants and any other accounts, whether they relate directly to the receipt or expenditure of public funds or not, which the Treasury may by minutes lay before Parliament. Section 4 of the 1921 Act requires stock and store accounts to be kept wherever the Treasury considers it necessary and stipulates that the Auditor-General shall examine such accounts on behalf of the House of Commons in order to ascertain that adequate regulations have been made for control and stock-taking.

The Audit Office

Altogether it may be said that the Auditor-General – the appointment is at present held by Sir Edmund Compton, K.C.B., K.B.E. – has a large, important and exacting job on his hands.

His position is in many ways unique. He is an officer of Parliament, not a Civil Servant, and yet as head of the Exchequer and Audit Department he controls a staff of Civil Servants. He has in the past always held positions in the Civil Service, usually in the Treasury, but his appointment is by letters patent. 'On the death, resignation, or other vacancy in the office of Comptroller and Auditor-General', reads the Act of 1866, 'Her Majesty may, by letters patent as aforesaid, nominate and appoint a successor.'

Nowadays, the normal practice is for the Prime Minister to make the nomination and for the Queen to do the appointing. Another unusual circumstance is that the Auditor-General's salary, amounting to £8,600 per annum, is paid – like that of the Speaker of the House of Commons – out of the Consolidated Fund and therefore does not appear in the Estimates

Make your taxes earn you money.

Tax Reserve Certificates make tax paying easier. As well as providing for your tax liabilities these certificates earn you a tax free income (provided you do use them to pay your tax).

There are two certificates, one for companies, and a personal one.

The Company Certificate, for Corporation Tax, is new. It offers more attractive terms than did the previous series— $4\frac{3}{8}$  per cent tax free, equivalent to £7.5.10 per cent at the current rate of Corporation Tax.

The Personal Certificate is for paying income tax, surtax and capital gains tax. If you pay tax at the standard rate its earnings of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent tax free are worth £5.19.1 per cent. At higher rates of tax, the effective yield is even greater.

In your own interest... act now that Parliament approves annually. It may be added that the Auditor-General, though he must have a considerable knowledge of Government departments, is not required to be a trained auditor or qualified accountant.

The wide range of duties devolving on the Auditor-General and his department entails, of course, an immense amount of detail work, and this is manageable only after it has been broken down into divisions, each of which is held responsible for the accounts of a particular ministry or group of ministries. The headquarters is Audit House, situated on the Victoria Embankment, so that both the Treasury and the Bank of England are within easy access. Assistant auditors, after taking up their appointments, are required to complete a three-year training course, the syllabus of which is designed to fit in with the department's special needs. Accounts and auditing, cost accountancy and law are the subjects taken, and an examination is held at the end of each year. It is not intended that the course should qualify students for membership of any of the recognized professional bodies, since such qualifications, as in the case of the Auditor-General himself, are not regarded as necessary. Nevertheless, though no exact figures are available, many of the staff do hold or are studying for professional qualifications – A.A.C.C.A. and A.C.W.A. being those most favoured. The force at present based on Audit House comprises approximately four hundred and fifty people.

Their work, like painting the Forth Bridge, is demanding and never ending, for the auditing process is a continuous one. Just occasionally, however, it happens that the dull routine of checking the books is enlivened by something out of the ordinary. A monumental blunder or misuse of funds is revealed. Such things are no more unknown at Westminster than in the City; but occurring in a Government department they have a weightier impact because they concern an exceptionally large body of shareholders – i.e. the entire British nation.

Watchdog v. Bloodhound

Since the present Auditor-General, Sir Edmund Compton, assumed office in 1958, he has displayed qualities – integrity, determination and independence of mind – that seem to suggest the born auditor. His probings into dark places have demonstrated the need for an audit department not only in detecting mistakes and misdeeds but in throwing the limelight on ministerial waste, inefficiency and extravagance.

He has on more than one occasion exposed ingenious methods of tax evasion, such as those employed by wealthy amateur farmers who bought farms with the express object of running them at a loss. The Auditor-General has directed attention to anomalies and abuses that were making the work of the Inland Revenue more difficult. It was he, for example, who pointed out the malpractice of certain employers who retained P.A.Y.E. deductions for lengthy periods to help finance their businesses.

A more celebrated piece of detective work was the Audit Department's revelation of an unhappy state of affairs in the Ministry of Aviation which, having placed a large order with a manufacturing firm, failed dismally in keeping a check on costs and profits. The 'Ferranti affair', widely commented upon in the Press, culminated in a Government debate. The then Minister of Aviation agreed that, in regard to the Bloodhound missile contract, there was a discrepancy of nearly 100 per cent between his department's estimates of Ferranti's likely labour costs and the costs of the labour they actually used.

Mr Callaghan, then in the Opposition, criticized the Ministry for not having improved the contracting methods to which the Public Accounts Committee – which considers all matters raised by the Auditor-General – had drawn attention four years earlier. Another Parliamentary debate on the subject of Ferranti took place on July 30th, 1965, and the Minister then agreed that the profits had indeed been excessive. After saying that the company had taken risks inherent in the contract, the Minister went on to announce that the directors – though under no obligation to do so – were willing to refund £4½ million and he had accepted the offer.

More power for the Auditor-General?

In addition to rousing a storm of criticism the 'Ferranti affair' inevitably posed questions. Had the Auditor-General merely exposed the tip of an iceberg? How many blunders and scandals remained undetected? What was being done to prevent such things happening again? That there might well be other cases was tacitly admitted by the Permanent Secretary to the Ministry of Aviation when the report of the Public Accounts Committee was being discussed. His admission did nothing to allay general uneasiness.

Only one positive suggestion appears to have emerged from the rumpus: that the powers of the Auditor-General should be strengthened. Certainly with Government expenditure reaching astronomical proportions, a case can be made out for more rigorous inspection of departmental accounts as well as for investigations into methods and organization. Taxpayers, themselves forced to stand and deliver, are at least entitled to the assurance that their money is being wisely and honestly spent.

They do not want a position to arise in which powerful Ministries, like the kings of old, squander public moneys without being responsible to anyone. Parliament may, therefore, find itself under pressure to extend the duties of the Auditor-General and give him more authority. This could well mean that just one hundred years after the office was created the two Acts at present in force may have to be carefully reconsidered and revised.

Allocation of Funds in a Dynamic Enterprise

IT is only in the last few years that management in the United Kingdom has really come to grips with the technicalities of using sophisticated methods of calculating the return on capital when allocating funds for new projects. Discounted cash flow (D.C.F.) in one or other of its forms is now fairly well known and practised in a number of cases. The allocation of funds exercises such a decisive effect on the future of a business, however, that it is useful to sit back, as it were, from the mechanics of comparing rates of return to see how the use of such methods should fit into the general management structure and the corporate strategy of the firm.

This relationship between the allocation of funds and the strategy of the company is critically examined by Seymour Tilles in the January/February issue of the Harvard Business Review in an article entitled 'Strategies for allocating funds'. As he states in his opening paragraph, 'The most tangible expression of a company's strategy is its allocation of funds. Few things determine the future of the company as directly as the way it spends its money. Those activities which are treated generously are presumably the real basis for the company's future. Those which receive skimpy allocations are clearly being designated as of 'minor strategic significance'.

Weaknesses of existing methods

In most businesses, proposals for utilizing the funds available to the business originate at the operating level of management, and all such proposals are submitted for the company as a whole to top management for approval. For this purpose the projects are ranked according to some objective criteria such as return on investment and any projects not meeting a minimum requirement are discarded and the others are approved.

Perhaps the greatest weakness in such a system of allocating funds is that the group of people (the board) who determine the long-run future of the business and how it will adapt itself to changes in environment are quite separate from the people in lower echelons of management who put up the proposals for investing funds. This may result in important strategic alternatives for the company not being considered at all because the originators of investment proposals are not aware of such alternatives. In a large company where investment proposals originate some distance down the line of management, a proposal which appears quite simple to the originator within his own sphere of operations may, in fact, impose quite severe problems in other areas of the business of which he knows nothing or very little. Moreover the long-term interests of the business may require dis-investment in areas which are currently profitable.

The organization of a company into departments, divisions, groups, etc., has a great deal of logic in terms of management structure, and the argument for relating the allocation of funds to such an organizational structure has been that it establishes the accountability of different levels of management and the responsibility of individual executives for their budgets. What is argued now is that the concept of a company having an overall strategic policy requires that this should be reinforced by an overall policy for allocating funds within the business.

Identifying the objectives of the firm

Mr Tilles illustrates such a concept with the recent re-organization of the Department of Defence in the U.S.A. The department consists of a headquarters function and the three service departments and previously the overall budget was allocated by dividing up the total amount available on a service basis. When Mr McNamara became Secretary of Defence he changed this and instituted an approach based on identifying the major purposes for which the department exists and allocating resources according to their relative importance, irrespective of the organizational structure of the department.

In some companies the concept of corporate strategy may emerge as a combination of product groups which will combine income and growth related to the risks involved, and the allocation of funds will then be made to products on some rational basis. The long-term objectives of the business may require the expansion of the company into new products, especially where there is rapid technological change. In such a situation where the company's objectives necessitate it staying in the forefront of such technological change, there may be a requirement to commit funds on a long-term basis with little prospect of any immediate return. Here a desirable combination of products may well be a group embodying products carrying the future growth prospects of the business and products which are relatively stable and earning the profits necessary to carry the risks inherent in the other products. It is highly probable that such a situation exists already in a number of technically advanced companies in Britain where old-established products are carrying the risk and burden of developing into new and more sophisticated products.

Reinforcing success

A company may allocate its funds on a more functional approach by isolating that particular function or functions which has made it better than and distinctive from its competitors. This is a useful approach since it concentrates the mind of management first on isolating those factors which have made it a successful company. Its particular facility may be in research, finance, manufacture or distribution, but in whichever area its particular competence may be it is one which should be preserved and improved by reinforcement from the funds available.

The use of existing methods of establishing criteria on which to assess the relative merits of competing sources of investment and capital budgeting within the organizational structure of the firm will continue to be essential processes in the art of management. What must be appreciated, however, is that such managerial processes should be subordinated to the overall strategy of the company.

The management of each company must identify the company's long-term objectives and the way in which they are to be achieved and determine the reactions of the company to changes in the environment within which it operates, and this overall concept of the business will then set the proper emphasis and limitations on the detailed operating budgets within the management structure.

Return on Equities and Fixed Interest Securities

PROFESSOR A. J. MERRETT and Mr Allen Sykes have, in the past, written on a variety of subjects (as for instance, capital investment) in such a lucid way that it seems remarkable, ex post facto, that no one else has ever thought along such obvious lines before. In the June issue of the District Bank Review they again demonstrate, as briefly referred to in 'Current Affairs' in our June 11th issue, their startling ability to go straight for the essentials. Their article was entitled 'Return on equities and fixed interest securities: 1919-66'.

The joint authors first asked themselves the question: What monetary benefits accrue from holding shares or debentures? The answer must be, dividends (or interest), and capital appreciation. Since both dividends and interest are paid net, from the investor's point of view we need to add these, net of tax, to the excess of the capital sum realized on sale over the original cost.

The next step was to decide what representative portfolio of equities should be taken. In their article the authors chose the broadly-based portfolio compiled by De Zoete & Gorton. (Had they taken the shares comprising the F.T. - Actuaries Index it is certain that their conclusions would have remained substantially unaltered.) For comparison purposes they needed a representative long-term fixed interest security, and they used Consols. Their main proposition was to determine which of the two groups, equities and long-term securities, gave a better return, and by how much. The difference is, in fact, remarkable.

Over the last ten years (1956-66) a single lump sum invested in equities would have given an overall return of 9.2 per cent. Had this sum been invested in Consols, the return would have been -0.6 per cent. In the calculation, compound interest rates have been used, of course. So that in the case of the equity portfolio this means that £100 invested in 1956 so as to receive 9.2 per cent yearly, the interest in each year being added back to the principal, would give a sum equal to the dividends (net) over the ten years together with the value of the portfolio as at 1966.

The next step was to consider what these figures of 9.2 per cent and -0.6 per cent really meant. Had the £100 in 1956 been used to purchase some non-perishable item, diamonds (say), then - assuming that diamond prices increase with other retail prices - their value would have gone up in any case by some 3 or 4 per cent per year. (The average increase in the index of retail prices over the last three years has been 3.7 per cent.) So the real gain, allowing for inflation, needs to be calculated. For the equity portfolio this comes to 5.9 per cent and for the Consols -3.6 per cent.

Early years' results

The most recent period is the one of greatest interest to us, and is certainly the one which is most likely to be of use in determining future trends. But the authors carried their research right back to the end of the First World War and their results are worth noting. For the inter-war period (1919-39), equities gave the high real rate of return of 12.4 per cent (money terms 10.3 per cent). For the ten years covering war conditions (1939-49) the real return was only 0.3 per cent, though the return in money terms was 5.9 per cent. For the post-war period (1949-66) the real term rate was 7.4 per cent (11.2 per cent in money terms).

The comparable figures for Consols for the three periods were respectively 6.5 per cent, -2.2 per cent and -4.6 per cent in real terms, and 4.6 per cent, 3.3 per cent and -1 per cent in money terms.

So the differential between equity and debentures (if we take Consols as being representative) has undergone substantial changes over the years. It was at its least in the war years, at its highest in the post-war years, and it is still very high.

Future trends

What is the future likely to hold? There are some new factors which may have a marginal effect. The capital gains tax must reduce the differential somewhat, since a proportion of the return on equities will be liable to this new tax. Corporation tax will have no direct effect on investors, but as we saw earlier this year, a large number of debenture issues have been made by companies wishing to take advantage of the fact that interest on fixed-interest bearing securities is deductible in assessing taxable profits. The supply of money on the market interested in Government securities and debentures, on the other hand, is rather limited, and is likely to become more limited. It must come very largely from those private investors who, because of age, disposition, etc., value security highly. (To a minor extent it is true that a direct comparison as between equity and debenture rates in the past was not fair, except for institutional investors; the average private investor just could not afford a portfolio. But unit trusts now give private investors the advantage of a high return on equity together with security.) It seems, therefore, that so far as debentures are concerned the demand for them is decreasing at the same time as the supply is increasing. Already well over 7 per cent must be offered by companies to catch the market. The cost of living still rises. It seems that for the foreseeable future rates will at least remain as high as they are, and may go higher.

The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants

Memorandum to the Chancellor on the Finance Bill

We reproduce below the memorandum on the Finance Bill recently submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, and to which reference was made in 'Current Affairs' in last week's issue

Clause 21

Surtax relief on certain payments to partners

THIS clause makes a very limited amendment of the provisions contained in section 12 of the Finance Act 1965 which section amended the provisions of section 415 of the Income Tax Act 1952. Basically the clause states the circumstances in which surtax relief will be given in respect of annual payments to partners under a partnership agreement, to the vendor of a business, to their dependants in each case, and to a former wife or a wife who is separated from her husband. In many cases the dependants of deceased persons commute their right to the annual income by assigning their rights under the agreement to financial institutions. It would seem that such an assignment could deprive the payer of surtax relief even though he could not restrain the other party from dealing in his rights under the agreement. It would be unjust to penalize the payer in this way and the clause should be amended accordingly.

Rights of directors and employees to acquire shares in their company

This clause severely restricts the freedom of action of progressive employers wishing to offer to their employees, as an incentive, a share in the business on preferential terms. Some existing schemes operated by public companies provide for the issue of shares to employees and the method adopted usually requires the payment of bonuses which are subjected to P.A.Y.E. income tax; the net amount of the bonus is then applied in the purchase of shares in the company.

Clause 23 presents two difficulties for companies operating these schemes:

- (1) The shares may be made available to employees at less than market value, either under the rules of the scheme or fortuitously.

- (2) There may be a restriction on the employee's right to dispose of the shares, so that their market value may be considerably less than the amount that would be received on a notional sale of the shares in the open market, as required by clause 23 (2) (a).

Since the clause is thus an impediment to companies that operate employee shareholding schemes, the Association suggests that powers should be taken to exempt approved schemes from the operation of these provisions.

Preferential allotment of shares to employees

Where a prospectus invites the public to subscribe capital on a new issue, preference is sometimes given to applications from employees. To the extent that the allotments to employees are made on a more favourable basis than allotments to the public generally, it seems possible that the employee has exercised a right to acquire shares (clause 23 (1)) granted by reason of his office or employment (clause 23 (3)). If the market value of the new shares is greater than cost it would be unreasonable that the employee's initiative in applying for shares in his company should result in a Schedule E tax liability while members of the public subscribing for the issue have no such liability.

Measurement of gain where shares acquired by option etc.

In fixing the terms on which new capital is to be raised, there are several factors accounting for shares being offered at a price below the market value of existing shares of the same class, notably that the company must allow for the contingency that the value of its shares may fall between the date the shares are offered and the date the offer closes. Another consideration is that to ensure the success of a capital raising operation a company will be obliged to offer new shares at a price slightly below their market value. The following of a sound commercial practice will, where employees are granted a right to subscribe for shares, cause clause 23 to be invoked against employees exercising the rights that have been offered to them. The Association suggests that in determining the amount chargeable, the market value should be reduced by, say, 5 per cent to allow for the points made above and to remove orthodox capital raising operations from the ambit of the clause.

Ascertainment of market value of shares acquired

One is required to ascertain 'the amount that a person might reasonably expect to obtain from a sale in the open market at that time of the shares acquired', but there is some uncertainty as to how this will work in practice.

Issues to employees on favourable terms often include restrictions on the rights of transfer, so that a purchaser would, at best, have only an equitable right. The uncertainty would be removed if the clause stipulated that, in determining the notional sale price, account should be taken of any restriction imposed as a condition of the issue of the shares.

Employees and whole-time service directors

It is suggested that progressive employers offering share participation to employees should not be discouraged. In the Association's view employees and whole-time service directors (holding less than 5 per cent of a company's share capital) should be excluded from the provisions of clause 23. The Revenue already possess wide powers to correct abuses of such an exemption, e.g. by assessment of benefits in kind. Furthermore, the short-term capital gains tax provisions and the capital gains tax will ensure that any profit arising on a disposal of shares acquired under an option scheme is subjected to tax.

Dividend paid out of pre-1966-67 profits by subsidiary companies

This clause amends the provisions of section 85 of the Finance Act 1965 and sets out in sub-clause (3) the circumstances in which a dividend paid on or after May 3rd, 1966, shall be regarded as having been paid before that date. In both sub-clause (3) (b) and (3) (c) the recommendation of the directors and the directors' decision needs to be 'publicly announced' before May 3rd, 1966. Clause 26 relates to groups of companies and in the main is directed towards declaration of dividends by subsidiary companies of public companies or to private companies which are themselves subsidiaries. It is common knowledge that dividends declared by such companies are invariably private announcements in the sense that the parent is advised of the proposed dividend for any one year. Indeed it would probably be an impossible task to provide an example of a public dividend announcement by a wholly-owned subsidiary company or by a private company.

Logic therefore suggests that the expression 'publicly announced', is intended to mean an announcement to the limited public who would be financially interested in the declaration and it further suggests an announcement in the same manner as has been adopted hitherto. It is, however, by no means certain that this logical meaning attaches to the clause as at present drafted. The Association takes the view that where either a subsidiary company has communicated its intention to a parent company or a parent company has communicated its instructions for the payment of a dividend to a subsidiary company this should be deemed to be a public announcement for the purposes of the clause. The Association therefore recommends that the clause be amended accordingly.

Clause 33

Abolition of investment allowances

This clause provides inter alia that where, under a contract entered into on or before January 16th, 1966, expenditure is incurred after that date, investment allowances will be granted only if (a) the payment is made, and (b) the asset is brought into use not later than October 16th, 1966.

The withdrawal of investment allowances is compensated by the investment incentive grant proposals contained in Part I of the Industrial Development Bill, but it is clear that not all expenditure that would have qualified for investment allowances will qualify for the payment of a Government grant.

Companies with large projects under construction will be adversely affected by the fixing of October 16th, 1966, as the terminal date, especially where construction had commenced before the Government's proposals were made known.

The Council of the Association is aware of a multi-million pound development which should be completed and brought into use at the end of September 1966. If, due to unforeseen circumstances, the project cannot be brought into use until after October 16th, 1966, the company will be denied investment allowances on all expenditure incurred since January 16th, 1966, so that the tax allowances in this case will be dependent upon the efficiency of the contractors. If the contract is completed on schedule, the company's loss will be limited to investment allowances only on its retention moneys.

The clause has further serious defects, for example, in relation to instalments under hire-purchase agreements entered into before January 17th, 1966. In a case where capital expenditure is being incurred by a person with a view to carrying on a trade, the assets would not be brought into use until the date of commencement of the trade and it would be a particular hardship if, because the trade commenced after October 16th, 1966, no investment allowances whatsoever were to be granted.

Moreover, dependence upon the date of payment rather than the date upon which expenditure is incurred is unsatisfactory and contrary to all previous legislation of this nature. In the Association's view, the requirement that an asset should be brought into use by October 16th, 1966, should be confined to cases in which the safe-guarding of investment allowances was the main objective of the placing of a contract and where construction of the asset had not commenced within twelve months of the contract being placed.

A considerable administrative problem will arise, particularly for companies maintaining asset records on computers, if the termination of investment allowances is to be made by reference to a date of payment, rather than the date expenditure is incurred. Bearing in mind that the President of the Board of Trade has announced that the Industrial Development Bill is to be amended to meet these difficulties (Hansard, May 16th, 1966, col. 953), the Association recommends that the Finance Bill be similarly amended.

Section 37*Transactions in securities and changes in the taxation system

This clause is an extension of section 28 of the Finance Act 1960 and in our view the case for retaining that section has been considerably weakened by the introduction of the capital gains tax and the liability to income tax under Schedule F in respect of distributions. Although section 28 was originally stated to be aimed at dividend-stripping and bond-washing the Courts have given the section a far wider interpretation than this, and the Inland Revenue has been provided with sweeping powers to attack a broad field of commercial activities of a perfectly legitimate kind. As the cases of C.I.R. v. Parker and C.I.R. v. Cleary demonstrate, the ordinary citizen may now be required to run the gauntlet of section 28 of the Finance Act 1960, in circumstances to which the section was originally never intended to refer. Persons undertaking transactions in securities must have regard to the tax consequences, but general anti-avoidance legislation of the kind enacted in 1960, because of its complexity, adds to the difficulties of business administration. The Association therefore recommends the repeal of section 28 of the Finance Act 1960 and the introduction of new provisions which will clarify the position of the taxpayer in relation to transactions in securities.

Land Commission Bill

The White Paper on the Land Commission (Cmd 2771) and subsequent Government statements suggested that the Finance Bill would incorporate provisions defining the relationship between the levy and the taxation of profits arising from transactions in land. The omission of such provisions from the Bill might suggest that the first appointed day will not fall within the fiscal year 1966-67 but, whether or not this is the case, elucidation of the tax consequences in the following circumstances is urgently required.

- (1) Levy payable by a corporate property investment company and the relief in respect of that levy for capital gains tax purposes.
- (2) Levy payable by a trading company and relief for corporation tax purposes in respect of that levy in so far as it is borne by the company.
- (3) Levy paid by individuals or non-corporate bodies in so far as it affects the computation of a capital gains tax liability.
- (4) Levy paid by individuals or non-corporate bodies, partnerships, etc., who are trading where there are levy implications.

The Association recommends that a suitable clause be inserted in the Finance Bill 1966 to deal with all the above matters

Grouping for corporation tax purposes

During the discussions on the Finance Bill 1965 the Association pressed for provisions to permit grouping for corporation tax in a manner similar to that formerly permitted for profits tax. It was understood that pressure of time both for drafting and in Parliament prevented any action last year, but that the matter would be further considered between then and now. The Revenue were of the opinion that subvention payments would provide at least a temporary solution to the problems which grouping solves. The recent case of Davies v. Davies, Jenkins & Co Ltd is, however, an example of the occasions when subvention payments are not adequate to deal with the problems involved. Corporation tax is intended to ensure that all profits are taxed once, but only once, and grouping is a necessary factor in ensuring that this principle is in fact achieved. Once again the Association urges that legislation to permit grouping at the taxpayer's option should be introduced.

Incomplete drafting of fiscal legislation

In the view of the Association it is a retrograde step that the Finance Bill contains only a part of the legislation relating to capital grants and the selective employment tax. Not only is it impossible to judge the overall effects of these provisions but in dealing with any question concerning these matters it will be necessary to consult more than one piece of legislation.

The Association deplores the fact that as a result of the Government's proposals it will be necessary for business men and their advisors to deal with several Government departments, e.g. the Inland Revenue, the Board of Trade and the Ministry of Labour, instead of with a single department – the Inland Revenue – as in the past. The inevitable result is more forms to be completed, separate negotiations and the provision of more detailed information. This process must be more costly, not only in money, but in time and labour, the scarcest resources in the United Kingdom at the present time. Not only will many more Civil Servants be required but the accountancy profession and industry will need more staff merely to achieve a result which could have been achieved by adjustments to the investment allowance provisions and by a selective employment tax without premiums but charged at varying rates with appropriate exemptions.

The result of all this is that instead of progress toward simplification of taxation procedure one is faced with further complexity and this despite the fact that the Association together with other interested parties has been pressing for many years the now desperate need for simplification of the entire taxation system. The Finance Act 1965, far from being a simplification measure, added further complexities and the Finance Bill 1966 appears to do likewise.

The Association lends its voice to the many protests now finding an echo from the general public and reiterates its view that simplicity should be a cardinal feature of all fiscal legislation.

Computation of losses allowable against corporation tax assessments

As Part II of the Fifteenth Schedule to the Finance Act 1965 was headed 'Continuity of Loss Relief and Other Matters', it had been widely assumed that for the fiscal year 1965-66 the existing law and practice in relation to capital allowance remained unchanged. The Association understands that the Inland Revenue interpret this paragraph as prohibiting the inclusion of capital allowance relating to the basis year in computing a loss for 1965-66, and if such interpretation is correct, legislation to restore the position should be incorporated in the Finance Bill 1966.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'.

London and Thames Haven Oil Wharves Limited v. Attwooll

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
(Before Mr Justice BUCKLEY)

Income tax – Capital asset put out of use – Insurance money received for physical damage – Loss by reason of non-use of asset – Sum attributable thereto – Whether that sum a trade receipt – Merchant Shipping Act 1894, section 503 – Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900, section 1 – Income Tax Act 1952, section 122 (Schedule D).

The company owned five deep water jetties including one which had cost £346,323. In 1953, owing to the negligent handling of a ship, this jetty was seriously damaged. It cost £83,167 to repair the jetty, and it was out of use for 380 days, and the company suffered loss from the non-usability of the jetty for that period. The total amount of damage incurred by the company, as agreed with its insurers, was £115,617, of which £32,450 was for loss of the use of the jetty.

The owners of the ship limited their liability to £77,876. The company was insured against physical damage, but not against loss of use; and the insurers agreed that the £77,876 received from the shipowners should be apportioned rateably to the physical damage and the damage by loss of use. The £77,876 was accordingly treated by the company and the insurers as to £55,083 in respect of the physical damage, and as to £22,792 in respect of the damage by loss of use. The insurers paid the company £26,696 for the physical damage plus £42 for legal expenses relating to that part of the claim. The £26,738 thus received, with the £77,875 from the shipowners, formed the total sum of £104,614 received from both sources, and this total exceeded the costs of repair plus the legal costs by £21,404.

The calculation of the sum representing the loss of the use of the jetty for 380 days was not related to earnings or to profit. The company and the underwriters agreed that the sum should be calculated by adding a percentage to the company's normal depreciation rate of 4 per cent on the cost of the jetty, namely, £346,323. Thus the total claim for loss of the use of the jetty for 380 days was arrived at by taking 9 per cent of the cost, namely £32,450. No item for tax on compensation for loss of profit was included.

The £21,404 was included in the company's Case I assessment as a trade profit. It was contended for the company that the sum was part of one capital sum of £104,614 received in respect of damage to a capital asset; or, alternatively, that the £21,404 was compensation for the sterilization of a capital asset; or alternatively again, that in so far as the £21,404 could be attributed to depreciation, it was a capital item. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the Revenue.

Held: (i) the £21,404 could not be treated as attributable to depreciation, (ii) that sum was compensation for the sterilization of a capital asset, and was a capital receipt.

In re Holmden's Settlement

Estate duty – Settlement – Discretionary trust – Accumulation of surplus income – Variation of trust – Distribution of trust fund – Whether limited interest disposed of – Whether trust fund deemed to have passed on life-tenant's death – Finance Act 1894, sections 1, 2 (1) (b), 22 (1) (l) – Finance Act 1940, section 43.

By a settlement deed made in 1927 the trust income was payable during the joint lives of the settlor and his wife, on a discretionary trust for the settlor's wife and children and the children's issue, and any balance of income was to be accumulated. After the deaths of the settlor and his wife the income was to be applied for the children and their issue as the settlor's widow should appoint, and subject to any appointment half the income was to be paid to the settlor's son during his life, and afterwards half the capital was to be transferred to his children; and the other half of the income was to be paid to the settlor's daughter during her life, and afterwards her half of the capital was to be transferred to her children.

The settlor's wife survived him. The son had three children and the daughter two children. In 1960 an order was made varying the trusts of the settlement. The period of the discretionary trust of income during the life of the settlor's wife was extended for the duration of her life or the period of twenty-one years from the operative date of the order, whichever period should be the longer, and the wife's power of appointment was cancelled. After the end of the trust period the capital was to be divided among the son and the daughter of the settlor and their children. There was power for the trustees to declare the trust period at an end as regards part or the whole of the trust fund. In 1962 the settlor's wife died.

It was contended by the Inland Revenue that estate duty was payable on the death of the settlor's widow, and the contention was based on these arguments: (i) that the trust fund passed under section 1 of the Finance Act 1894 with the assistance of section 22 (1) (l) of that Act, (ii) that it passed under section 1 aided by section 2 (1) (b) and section 22 (1) (l), (iii) that the trust fund had to be deemed to have passed under section 43 of the Finance Act 1940. It was contended on behalf of the trustees (i) that there had been no determination of the life interest of the settlor's widow, (ii) that section 43 was not applicable to the determination of a discretionary trust.

Held (affirming the decision of Mr Justice Pennycuik) Lord Denning dissenting: section 43 of the Finance Act, 1940 was not applicable because (i) that had not been a determination or disposition of the life interest, (ii) alternatively, if there had been a determination or a disposition, it was not in favour of other persons.

Preliminary report

A CRUCIAL shortcoming in the preliminary profit and dividend announcement by McCorquodale & Co Ltd was commented on in this column in the issue of April 2nd. When sending out the full accounts, the company complained of erroneous assumptions made on the basis of the preliminary figures, which omitted the figure for overseas tax because the figure was not called for by the London Stock Exchange in the preliminary announcement form.

This column's point was that the Stock Exchange's prescribed minimum form of preliminary reporting does not absolve companies from leaving overseas taxation out of any preliminary statement, particularly if overseas tax has a bearing on the position. This week's reprint is of a preliminary statement by Blackwood Hodge Ltd which not only makes an overseas tax point but which goes far beyond the acknowledged bounds normally set.

Chairman of Blackwood Hodge is Mr W. A. Shapland, F.C.A., who took up the chairmanship of this and other companies on the death of Mr Bernard Sunley in November 1964. Mr Sunley was the founder of Blackwood Hodge in 1941 and the company markets earth-moving equipment for Euclid, Cummins Engine, International Harvester and other companies. The overseas tax item is evidence enough of the extent of the group's world markets.

Appreciation

In the original, the 1965 figures in the Summarized Group Results were in red, which emphasized them. The amount and percentage figures for the increases in 1965 over 1964 bring out the immediate impact of the figures themselves, and the net asset value of the shares, the Stock Exchange price 'high' and 'low' and the capital gains tax base prices for the ordinary and preference shares (the former adjusted to the present capital) all show, not only an appreciation of what shareholders want to know, but also a willingness to give it to them.

The provision of this information at the time of the preliminary profit announcement also indicates an appreciation of Stock Exchange matters. More often than not — in fact almost invariably — it is the preliminary announcement that has the greater stock-market impact.

It is the preliminary announcement that counts in stock-market terms simply because it is the first news of a company's full-year figures. First impressions count and Mr Shapland, in Blackwood Hodge's case, was obviously intent on making sure that the first impressions were the correct ones. It may not be necessary to go to Mr Shapland's length to make the point, but the Blackwood Hodge exercise should be noted by those companies which consider preliminary reporting a necessary evil warranting nothing more than the bare figures that the Stock Exchange requests.

Other people's problems

ACCOUNTANTS still wrestling with the aftermath of the Finance Act 1965 may find some consolation in that other people in other walks of life have their problems of translating Governmental decisions into action. Mr Adrian Cadbury, chairman of The British Cocoa and Chocolate Co, recently commented on the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Foods' proposals for food labelling regulations, which include rigorous controls on label design.

He told shareholders that, under these proposals, all the company's products — British Cocoa and Chocolate is the controlling company of the Cadbury-Fry-Pascall group — would have to be described in detailed technical language. Cadbury's 'Flake' for example would have to carry the description 'convoluted milk chocolate'.

The description has to be carried in letters of such size that 'the smallest rectangle capable of enclosing each letter, apart from the initial letter, shall be not less than nine-sixteenths of the area of the smallest rectangle capable of enclosing the largest letter, apart from the initial letter in the word Flake'.

'Quite apart from making good label design impossible, what new protection does this directive give to the consumer?' Mr Cadbury asks.

No inhibitions

The directors, as the report and accounts show, have no inhibitions about giving shareholders, and the rest of the chocolate and confectionery trade at large, information on how big the group is, how much it sells at home and abroad and for what profit.

The profit and loss account, in fact, opens with sales at £115 million against £101.5 million and, in the chairman's statement, the sales are broken down into Home £80.6 million, Export (excluding sales to overseas subsidiaries) £4.6 million, and Overseas Companies £29.9 million.

So far as profits are concerned, of total pre-tax profits of £9,797,000, home and export business accounted for £7,102,000 (72 per cent) and overseas business for 28 per cent.

Wide and uncertain fluctuations in the cocoa price in 1965 tended to cancel themselves out by the end of the year, whereas at the half-year stage inventory losses looked possible. The chairman says that the directors decided that a more normal view of the financial position would be given if stock were valued at the lower of cost or realization value and this basis has been used in the latest accounts. Previously the lower of cost or replacement price had been used, but the change in basis does not materially affect the past year's profits. A stock provision of £315,000 made in earlier years, however, is no longer necessary and has been released.

CITY NOTES

INDUSTRIAL equities continue to make what running there is in the stock-markets. The price spiral enforced by share shortage, weight of investment money and gains tax considerations which work against profit taking, continues to put a premium on equity investment.

The institutions periodically come in as buyers but underlying and insistent support from unit trusts, which continue to pull in small investor money at a record rate, is one of the principal props. Rank and file investors are inflation conscious to a degree that makes them totally disregard evidence of pressure on industrial profits and the virtual inevitability of further deflationary measures by the Government.

It is understandable that they should disregard these points since the Government appears to persist in its policies of attempting to deflate by higher taxation which, under conditions of overfull employment, must be inflationary rather than the reverse.

Evidence of pressure on short-term interest rates and the translation of that evidence into terms of a possible rise in Bank rate has not shaken investment faith in equities as the answer to the preservation of the worth of savings. With equities virtually at an all-time peak in index terms, there is little evidence of any general inclination to take profits.

BANK shares have been a firm market on the Stock Exchange following the Prices and Incomes Board's decision to investigate bank charges. The stock-market assumption is that, to justify their charges, the banks will have to reveal their true profits to the Board and that the Board will, in turn, reveal the banks' true profits in any report it makes on the investigation's findings. This tends to smack of adding two and two together and making the answer twenty-two, but the stock-market is not averse to such arithmetic if it suits the mood of the moment. The prospect – or even remote possibility – of the banks having 'to tell all' is good enough in stock-market terms.

* * * *

THE British Oxygen Company is the latest 'blue chip' company to be in danger of losing some of its investment status. Last year the company, a shade surprisingly, raised its dividend from 10 per cent to 11 per cent but it looks as though payment will be back to 10 per cent, at best, this year. Interim dividend is being held at 3 per cent but shareholders are warned that the final will not necessarily be maintained at last year's 8 per cent. The half-year report shows a £1.4 million rise in sales but a £530,000 drop in pre-tax profits, an uncomfortable position for a company which stands to be hard hit under full corporation tax conditions.

THE Treasury bill rate rose last week to its highest level since the reduction from 7 per cent to 6 per cent in Bank rate. The rise in the bill rate followed a week during which the discount market had been forced, for the first time since last January, to borrow from the central institution to cover the daily position. The Bank of England is currently at some pains to keep short-term interest rates in London as high as possible for sterling support purposes. Under current conditions these efforts are unlikely to diminish.

For all the Central Bank support for sterling there is likely to be pressure on the £ all the time the assumption is held, and the evidence suggests, that the British balance of payments position continues to be heavily in the red. A balanced payments position by the end of this year is quite clearly a forlorn hope.

Decimal Currency System

SIR, – Congratulations on your leader on decimal currency in the June 4th issue. Things look bad when a gullible committee reports the view of a narrow-minded Bank to a Chancellor who, as reported under 'In Parliament' in the same issue, prefers to start off with an unworkable system in the hope that it may endure for a thousand years.

I hope you continue your campaign against the £ system, but before you plump unreservedly for the 10s system, may I ask you to consider the merits of using our present florin as a main unit, sub-divided into one hundred cents.

It seems to me to have the following overwhelming advantages:

- (1) The vast majority of West Europeans and North Americans earn between 100 and 300 of their main unit each week. The florin would bring us right into the range established by the experience of others as giving a main unit large enough and a subsidiary unit small enough for all practicable purposes.
- (2) Conversion of pounds and shillings is easy; that of pence rather easier than with a 10s or £ unit, the cent being about a  $\frac{1}{4}d$ .
- (3) All our notes and our 2s, and 1s and 6d coins would circulate side by side for a time with notes and coins of the same design bearing new values. The half-crown could be withdrawn by the banks in the months preceding decimalization, and eventually demonetized. Only the minor coins would need to be replaced.

Yours faithfully,

R. S. FRASER,

Why Not Free Depreciation?

SIR, – Mr Callaghan was confronted, on appointment, with many grave problems. Some he has resolved, or mitigated; others must await further stages of his 'programme of reforms stretching years ahead'.

One such problem is the huge shift of taxation – during the previous dozen-or-so years – from companies to persons:

Direct U.K. taxes paid by	companies (£ million)	persons

Personal tax increased by £2,500 million (17½ per cent pro rata to incomes); while direct United Kingdom taxes paid by companies were reduced by £275 million – 65 per cent pro rata to incomes.

Such distortion was due, on the one hand, to erosion by inflation of personal allowances and the off-loading to employees of the unfunded liabilities of the State pension scheme; and, on the other, to substantial increases of capital and other allowances to companies, which were used to treble dividends, rather than for the capital re-equipment for which they were intended.

Initial allowances – accelerated depreciation – were introduced in 1945 (in 1946 they amounted to £97 million) and, in 1954, investment allowances – tax-free bonuses on capital expenditure. Allowances deemed to cover depreciation have been so increased that they now exceed (by about one-quarter) the value of assets consumed – even at current prices. Altogether, company capital allowances in 1964 amounted to £1,967 million, as compared with depreciation of some £750 million – a tax bonanza of £650 million.

The radical reform of company taxation is thus being stultified by the continuation of such tax bonanzas, recently enhanced and partly converted into direct cash grants – with all their 'red tape' and waste of precious manpower.

A simultaneous radical reform of company capital allowances is needed: it is neither sensible to mulct to taxation that part of company incomes already expended on fixed capital formation; nor is it sensible to reduce the Government share of the gross net profit of one year, by reason of the capital formation of earlier years.

The simple solution of such twin dilemmas is free depreciation – the once-for-all allowance for fixed capital formation as and when expended, as strongly advocated by the Confederation of British Industry, but – incredibly – rejected for 'reasons of cost to the Exchequer'.

Company capital allowances in 1964 (88 per cent of fixed capital formation of £2,232 million) cost the Exchequer some £1,000 million; and it is unlikely – particularly in view of the reduction of the company tax rate from 56½ per cent to 40 per cent – that they could cost appreciably more this year, even if on the basis of free depreciation.

Such recent Government decision (in the White Paper Investment Incentives, issued in January 1966 and now being implemented by a Bill) must have been based on the relative capital formation and allowances of all corporate bodies – including public corporations, with a large shortfall of allowances. But the expenditure of manpower on their tax computations is not only wasteful – and now seemingly dangerous – it is also futile: direct United Kingdom taxes paid by public corporations (1964) was £8 million – out of Government loans and subsidies of £587 million.

It is not too late for Mr Callaghan to have a salutary change of heart: the Finance Bill is not yet enacted. But we must await his next Budget for an increase in the rate of corporation tax, to compensate (if only in part) for the tax bonanza of capital allowances – whether on the existing muddled basis – or, preferably, on the simple basis of free depreciation; and for a start, at least, to correct the personal side of the distorted 'tax equation'.

Yours faithfully,

Cheam, Surrey.

Exclusion of Surtax Relief

SIR, – I am surprised that in your editorial on the Finance Bill you did not object to clause 22, which proposes to cancel retrospectively the surtax relief available under section 238 of the Income Tax Act 1952. I am concerned with the retrospective element, not with the details; but it is apparent that the Chancellor could easily have proposed such a clause last year if he has understood what the 1965 Finance Bill meant.

The Prime Minister says the British Government is trying to restore the Rule of Law in Rhodesia; but have we got the Rule of Law here? My understanding is that it requires known general prospective laws, as opposed to incomprehensible discriminatory retrospective regulations.

The Chancellor said recently (Hansard, col. 648, May 25th): 'When Parliament has expressed a clear intention of putting an end to a particular form of avoidance, but that intention is put in danger of being frustrated because loopholes are discovered in the original legislation and exploited, I shall feel justified in proposing further legislation to the House, which will be retrospective to the date from which the original legislation became operative.'

How can this be justified? Do the laws of this country not apply to the State? Penal retrospective legislation is totally inconsistent with the Rule of Law, and I hope (without expecting it) that the Chancellor will swiftly be repudiated by other members of the Government.

It is particularly unfortunate that Mr Callaghan should thus attempt to justify retrospective legislation, since in his recent letter to the President of the Institute he tried to justify the immense complications of last year's Finance Act by the trouble he took to avoid any possible charge of retrospective legislation! Perhaps he has taken less trouble this time? Or is it premature to discuss the Finance Bill until we have seen whether another 1,222 amendments (440 from the Chancellor himself) appear, like last year?

If Mr Callaghan means what he said about retrospective legislation in his recent letter to the President, he will withdraw clause 22. He is obviously not to be trusted if he does not mean what he says. And he had better think of another excuse for the complications of last year's Finance Act. His original excuse has been discredited within a fortnight.

Yours faithfully,

London W1.

Oral Tuition of Articled Clerks

SIR, – I read Mr Coulson's comments on the training of articled clerks which he made at last month's special meeting of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

I feel I cannot let such remarks pass in your columns without some kind of reply from those of us who are actively and intensively engaged in the oral tuition of articled clerks.

We work very hard to teach accountancy to articled clerks who are taking the Institute's examinations. We are not examination crammers, we are rather interpreters of a living and constantly changing professional syllabus, and we spend all our time and as much money as we can afford on new equipment, new books, new techniques for teaching, and new methods of study and approach. In my view to say that such classes are of doubtful or marginal value is entirely to deny any progress which has been made in the educational field since the Second World War.

I think that the point really at stake is this. There is little to choose between bad oral tuition and bad postal tuition, but there is a very definite limit to the progress that can be made on a postal tuition course; whereas persons who are attending an intensive course of oral tuition can be taught by men of suitable calibre and can enjoy the benefit of teaching machines, visual aids and healthy competition among themselves.

If there were truth in Mr Coulson's remarks as applied to ourselves, our record of passes in the Institute's examinations would closely correspond to the national average whereas in fact our results are substantially higher than this. Moreover, the average student, when studying a correspondence course, is concerned only with taking an examination, but when he attends a personal oral course he is obliged under close supervision to attend to the matters in which he is being instructed, and I do not believe that any tuition course which is able to earn its keep as such can exist on a purely cramming basis.

Yours faithfully,

PRIVATE TUTOR.

Inexpensive Standard Typewriter

AVAILABLE only abroad for the past four years, the Remington Standard 18 typewriter has been reintroduced to the British market at the low price of £58. This move has become possible as a result of the success of the export programme covering 104 countries which has enabled the company to streamline and expand production at its Glasgow factory.

In spite of its remarkably low price, today's version of the Standard 18 has maintained its high quality. It incorporates all the features normally found in a standard office machine such as: visible margin setting operated from the front of the machine by fingertip control; a legible zero-centre positioning scale to allow easy layout of display typed work, and light, fast carriage return.

Remington Rand Ltd, 65 Holborn Viaduct, London EC1.

Speedy Form Feed

FROM the moment that an individual form or unit set is slipped into the typewriter chute, the Wilkes Programmed Line Finder takes over. A touch on one key rapidly feeds the set to the first typing position; touching the key subsequently advances the form to any number of predetermined positions. Continuous stationery applications can also be programmed.

The Wilkes programmed Line Finder can be fitted to the majority of typewriter and office machines, both manual and electric, which may or may not be connected with data-processing systems. Its purpose is to replace line spacing with the touch of a key, located close to the keyboard. The device governs the vertical stopping position on the form.

The equipment's control discs are programmed with nothing more elaborate than a pair of scissors, to cover a wide variety and size of forms. The device does not interfere with normal operation of the machine, allows faster typing of forms, incurs less operator fatigue and, it is claimed, higher output.

'Golf-ball' Accounting

THE Accounting Machine Division of Addo have introduced the Class 8000 machine. This particular machine incorporates the I.B.M. 72 'Golf-Ball' electric typewriter; this enables typing to be done with the accounting machine carriage in static position and this is a real advantage in accounting procedures because it minimizes, to a great degree, carriage travel and renders operation a simple matter. Routine ledger procedures, cheque writing in tandem with purchase ledger and also professional outlines for solicitors, stockbrokers, advertising agents and insurance brokers, are features of demonstrations on this machine.

Addo Ltd, 47 Worship Street, London EC2.

Staffordshire Potteries' Invoicing

BY installing one Friden 5010 Computyper electronic sterling invoicing machine, costing just under £3,000, Staffordshire Potteries Ltd (of Longton, Stoke-on-Trent) have been able to reduce their invoice office staff by one typist and one Comptometer operator – an annual saving of almost £1,000. Invoices are now processed in less than half the time previously taken and invoice errors have dropped dramatically.

The Staffordshire Potteries group is one of the biggest earthenware producers in the U.K. and specializes in mass-produced tea and dinner ware. Production of the four companies which constitute the group is centralized at Meir Airport. In the last two years considerable strides have also been made in centralizing and mechanizing group accounting procedures.

In the past, invoices were computed by Comptometer operators and then processed on conventional typewriters. Under this system, it could take anything up to five days after the goods had been dispatched to send out an invoice. Using the 5010, one typist – with some checking assistance from another – can do the whole job. No Comptometer is needed since the machine automatically performs all calculations and invoices are posted within two days of the dispatch of goods.

With this machine, invoice preparation is reduced to a routine typing job. The operator simply types the descriptive part of the invoice and enters the relevant quantities and prices. All extensions, discounts, surcharges, sub-totals and totals are computed and printed automatically by the machine.

Staffordshire Potteries' invoices are complex documents because goods may be packed and charged in several different ways. Units dispatched may be charged at a rate per dozen or per unit; dozens may be charged at a rate per gross or per dozen; and dozens and units are charged at a rate per dozen. Also there are three categories of goods: white, coloured and decorated, each requiring a separate sub-total, and three rates of discount that can apply to separate sections of the same invoice. In all these cases, the operator merely has to select the appropriate program key and the machine calculates and types the answer.

The tax routine highlights the machine's storage capabilities. This is because tax is applied as a percentage of the 'gross goods value' and the machine must hold this figure while discounts and surcharges are applied before it computes and applies the tax factor. The machine also stores separate running totals of sterling values and goods quantities for each of the group companies. These may be used for daily or batch analysis.

Friden Ltd, 101 Blackfriars Road, London SE1.

New Copying Concept

COPYING System A-09 involves two new 3M copying principles: dry photography and adherography. The dry photography principle is employed in the first machine of System A-09 which is used for making from one to ten copies at low cost, or for making the master for the second machine of System A-09 for multiple high-speed copying. The Dry Photo Copier employs a photographic principle in the exposure stage, and a heat process for development of a dry bond-weight copy. The entire process is dry and clean, and any original can be copied.

The second machine of System A-09, the Speed-Copier, uses a master which is coated with an adherographic material. The master is made from an original document in the Dry Copier, or by direct typing, writing, or pre-printing. This master is then used to create multiple copies in the Speed-Copier at a rate of up to forty a minute on normal bond-weight paper. This is accomplished by exposing the master to infrared energy while in contact with the run-off paper. The run-off paper is then automatically treated with a powder to develop the image. The image is then heat-fused to produce a permanent dry copy.

System A-09 can, therefore, be used either as a copying machine or for short-run duplicating - producing either one or hundreds of copies. Costs per copy can be as little as a  $\frac{1}{2}d$ .

Cash Storage after Hours

A SERVICE deposit safe is an addition to the Stratford range of safes. Cash and valuables can be deposited in the safe after hours without the need to open the safe door and without the keyholder being present. Those businesses which employ roundsmen, desk cashiers, counter cashiers, barmen, etc., can have takings protected in a safe without a cashier being present.

Stratford Service Deposit Safe

A simplified heavy-duty version of a bank night-deposit drawer forms an integral part of the body of the safe. Cash or valuables placed in the drawer are automatically dropped into the safe once the drawer is closed. They can only be retrieved by opening the safe door.

The safe is resistant to various methods of attack, including drills and explosives, and special security devices protect the drawer deposit aperture.

The deposit drawer can be located at the front or back of the safe. Furthermore, it can be extended to protrude through a wall of up to 5 in. thickness, making it unnecessary for the depositor to enter the cashier's office thereby ensuring greater security. Price £200 (including purchase tax).

Stratford Safe Co Ltd, Stirling Corner, Boreham Wood, Herts.

Bank Computer Network

ENGLISH ELECTRIC-LEO-MARCONI announced last week that an order worth £600,000 has been placed by Midland Bank Ltd for three System 4 computers. This brings the total value of English Electric-Leo-Marconi data processing equipment ordered by the Midland Bank (including three KDF 8 computers already in use) to approximately £1.5 million.

All three of the System 4 machines ordered by the bank will be sited in the north of England. Two computer centres, each employing a model 4-50 machine, will be set up at Liverpool and at Leeds. A smaller model 4-10 computer will be installed at Manchester and will be linked directly to the Liverpool centre.

The new computers will handle the current accounts of over three hundred branches. The work involves a very rapid daily turn-round of customer account transactions so as to provide each branch with a complete and up-to-date picture of the accounts handled by them. The main task of the Manchester computer installation will be to ensure the rapid flow of data and results to and from the Liverpool centre.

Computers in Advertising

EIGHTEEN papers on the uses of computers, with particular reference to their applications in the advertising industry, are included in a useful recent publication entitled Computers in Advertising issued by the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising. All the papers were presented at a computer seminar organized by the Institute at Brighton in November last year.

The papers are divided into five groups: 'Computers - what they are and what they do'; 'The role of the computer in advertising agency administration'; 'Operational research'; 'Media selection', and 'Survey analysis'. A glossary of automatic data processing terms and a bibliography is also included.

Copies of the publication are available from the public relations office of the I.P.A., 44 Belgrave Square, London SW1, price 21s post free.

INSTITUTE OF ACTUARIES Annual Meeting

In his address to the recent annual meeting of the Institute of Actuaries, the retiring President, Sir Herbert Tetley, K.B.E., C.B., M.A., F.I.A., stated that the Institute's total membership was now in excess of 3,000 for the first time and that this represented a 50 per cent expansion since 1952.

In a reference to tuition and examinations, the President said that good progress was being made with a complete review of the present arrangements despite a rapidly changing background in schools and universities.

Sir Herbert said that a fall in the number of new recruits to the Institute's examinations was attributable to special causes. In particular, partial exemptions from the Preliminary examination had been eliminated following the raising of the minimum entry requirements to include at least two 'A' level passes. There had also been a falling off in the number of new students in India due to changing circumstances in that country.

In his concluding remarks, Sir Herbert announced that the Council had decided to award Silver Medals to two members, Mr R. J. Kirton, C.B.E., F.I.A., and Mr M. E. Ogborn, F.I.A., in recognition of services of special importance to the Institute, and also of the fact that professional organizations abroad had acknowledged their services to the actuarial profession as a whole.

New President

The new President of the Institute is Dr B. Benjamin, B.Sc., PH.D., F.I.A., who is Director of Intelligence of the Greater London Council and was recently appointed honorary consultant in Medical Statistics to the Army.

Some 250 members and guests attended a banquet and ball held by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants at the Dorchester Hotel, London, on June 17th. Responding to the toast of 'The Guests' proposed by Mr H. Hodgson, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., then President of the Institute, M. F. M. Richard, President of the Ninth International Congress of Accountants (left), expressed the belief that the Institute would in future, as it had in the past, contribute its vitality and its ideas to the development of the profession and added 'we in France watch your endeavours very carefully and watch all that you do in various fields of management accounting'. He had noted with pleasure that a considerable number of members of the Institute would be in Paris in September next year to take part in the International Congress.

AN IMPORTANT NEW BOOK

Just published

MANUAL OF AUDITING

by Vivian R. V. Cooper, F.C.A.

In recent years the whole approach to auditing has changed. The old concepts of routine checking and vouching have gone and new standards are being set and new procedures evolved. This has become more than ever necessary by the increasing use of computers for which auditing techniques now have to be designed.

Taking as his starting-point the system of internal control installed by management, the auditor's task is to point out the weaknesses to his client and to make a tailor-made audit programme to fit the job in which tests of the day-to-day transactions are cut to a minimum. The auditor now observes, at regular intervals, the physical stock-taking carried out by his client's staff; if his report to shareholders is not to be qualified, he requires his client to maintain a higher standard of book-keeping and accounts than hitherto. His audit is carefully planned and is backed by a well defined system for the preparation, filing and presentation of working papers.

This book, which includes a comprehensive set of specimen forms and schedules, is the first of its kind in the United Kingdom which sets out these modern techniques and procedures in a readily understandable form. It is essentially practical and, except for a few changes necessary to make it suitable for publication, is based on the manual which has been developed over a long period of years, and is in daily use, by a firm of chartered accountants in practice.

PROFESSIONAL

QUALIFIED AUDITORS

Many qualified men have come to our offices with the view that the profession cannot offer them an interesting and well-paid career. After a friendly chat and a few examples of some professional opportunities, they have agreed that it might be worth while having a look at some of these. Almost without exception their outlook changes - they find a professional post to their liking - WHY? - because many of the vacancies we have never come on the open market - they have been given to us exclusively.

UNQUALIFIED AUDITORS

There are literally hundreds of unqualified men working in the profession who are actually scared to make a change. They feel that the lack of qualification restricts their movements. This of course is utter nonsense. We are ALWAYS glad to see this category of staff as we are confident that we can find them a better post.

DOES THE ABOVE APPLY TO YOU?

- Then contact GRAHAM ELSMLIE who will happily prove this to be true. But don't be selfish - show this to some of your colleagues - there are plenty of jobs for all to choose from.

Most pension schemes are planned to provide for a predetermined annuity or capital sum for its purchase. Usually, only a portion of investment gains is made available to meet any possible additional requirements.

A privately administered pension plan can, however, be depended upon to achieve the maximum from successful investment. This is the way we work at Chase Manhattan. Pension plans are so devised that they create a fund into which all investment gains are ploughed back. The fund is better able, therefore, to safeguard the plan against such contingencies as inflation.

Why not have a chat with us, let us show you how, in conjunction with an independent consulting actuary, a plan can be prepared to meet your organization's precise requirements. You'll discover just what an advantage it is to have a friend at Chase Manhattan.

Prices and Incomes Bill

FOR some time past it has been increasingly evident that, despite Mr GEORGE BROWN's energetic efforts to induce a spirit of voluntary restraint in demands for higher incomes, the Government's incomes policy has proved a failure. For even longer it has been clear that unless cost inflation within the U.K. economy could be controlled, the future of sterling would be imperilled.

The Government's latest effort to resolve this apparently insoluble problem is the Prices and Incomes Bill published on Monday. It comprises three main sections. The first puts the National Board for Prices and Incomes on to a statutory basis and also requires it to report on any matter concerning prices and incomes that may be referred to it. The second part, which can be brought into effect by an Order in Council, requires the notification to the Board of all proposed increases in corporate distributions, as well as in pay and prices. Inclusion of dividends comes as no surprise; it is the inevitable quid pro quo for trade union acceptance of the 'early warning' legislation. A final section exempts the nationalized boards from the control over prices and charges since their tariffs are already subject to public control.

The keystone of the latest proposals is that pending the Board's review of any claim, there is an effective stand-still period which can last as long as four months. The MINISTER also has powers to extend it. Implementation of any pay or price increase during the interim period will incur a fine of up to £500, just as failure to notify the Board of any increase will also attract a penalty.

The obvious question is whether the proposals will prove effective. All experience shows that legislation which is not acceptable to the parties affected by it does not in the long run prove workable. Doubts have already been expressed on all sides as to the practicability of the latest proposals and the resignation of Mr FRANK COUSINS provides an eloquent comment.

Apart from the temporary stand-still which the Bill proposes, it is difficult to see how it can prove effective. For even a prolonged period of control would create as many problems as it would resolve, unless it proved possible in the interim to evolve a new system of wage negotiation. So far there are no signs of any new thinking. It may be argued that the only alternative is to deflate the pressure on the nation's labour resources to the point at which an incomes policy ceases to be necessary. Such a proposal ignores the disparities in the employment opportunities in different regions, and is, in short, the counsel of despair. There is little time left to find an effective alternative.

Government and Industry

THE benefits arising to the community from Government procurement of industrial goods and services are frequently not susceptible to mathematical measurement; and the aim of the Government must be to disburse the minimum amount of the taxpayer's money. The Government, however, does not merely purchase within a market: it is concerned with the creation of market conditions which will equate the supply and demand for goods and for currency at a level which is consistent with a balanced flow of international payments.

In the negotiation of Government contract prices, therefore, the requirements of economic control and of private enterprise may appear to conflict. An opportunity for the public discussion of this problem area was provided by the Ferranti affair which was followed by the reports of the Lang Committee. The second of these, published in 1965 (see The Accountant, February 20th, 1965), recommended that until a price was agreed on a Ministry contract, the Ministry should have 'equality of information' with its contractors; but on the definition of a fair price the committee cannot be said to have formulated any clear fundamental principles.

The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants has now stepped into the arena with a memorandum (reproduced elsewhere in this issue) which may prove to be a milestone not only in the relationship between Government and industry but also in the understanding of the financial objectives of industrial enterprise, and in the general acceptance of improved accounting techniques.

The I.C.W.A. puts into perspective the problem of contract pricing as 'only one aspect of the wider problem of developing a closer understanding between Government and industry' which is 'of great importance if the Government is to . . . encourage industry in achieving greater productivity and competitive prices whilst earning a reasonable return on capital employed.'

The rate of return on capital employed is the key factor in the Institute's subsequent discussion of the method of assessing the profit to be allowed to contractors. This rate of return must be such as to ensure that, after meeting the requirements of taxation, the enterprise provides to its members the rate of income which will attract them to invest; to ensure also the continuance of that income by keeping its facilities intact under current monetary conditions; and to enable the enterprise to extend its capital base so far as is necessary to the improvement of productivity.

Under current conditions the Institute estimates that a company must aim to earn an average of 23 per cent per annum on its total capital employed. The allowance for self-generated growth which this includes may be controversial, but excluding this the overall minimum requirement would still be 15 per cent per annum. At the maximum rates hitherto allowed by the 'official' profit formula (which are often not achieved), a company could suffer an annual depletion of its assets of up to 4.5 per cent.

The memorandum does not define 'capital employed' (which by implication is taken at cost) but submits that the total of all capital employed should be taken into account. This recognizes that capital employed in research and administrative activities is not capable of yielding high returns, so that the average return required must be achieved by a compensating higher than average return on production assets.

Turning its attention to the problems of cost finding and control, the I.C.W.A. strikes hard at that citadel of ineffective management, the historic job cost. Perhaps in committing to writing the statement that 'there is no such thing as an actual cost' the Institute allows itself a moment of philosophical abstraction, though its subsequent examination of the available techniques of overhead absorption underline the point; but there is no mistaking the strength of its main line of argument — that costs must be controlled continuously; that such control demands realistic estimates; and that the system of management by exception thus evolved cannot be over-laid with the collection of 'so-called actual costs' without 'a massive duplication of accounting routines and a diversion of management effort'.

The whole crux of control is good estimating. If this need can be satisfied, prices can be settled early in a contract based on technical estimates agreed between the two parties. Unfortunately, industrialists are keenly aware that the need is far from being satisfied; and this particular lack of skill was one of the factors in the Ferranti fiasco.

The I.C.W.A. is led to conclude that the demand for 'equality of information' must not be interpreted as a demand for the imposition of costing techniques which are irrelevant to dynamic management, but must be transformed into a demand for right relations between Government and industry.

It would be to the benefit of the community as a whole if this courageous memorandum were to provide a starting point not only for improved techniques in price negotiation but also for revitalized thought about the role of private industry in the modern State.

Design for Auditing

DESPITE the increased work caused by complicated taxation legislation and the opportunities afforded by the development of management accounting of providing clients with advice on their day-to-day problems, the principal occupation of most firms of practising accountants is still auditing. But although auditing retains this, as it were, departmental predominance, its character has changed almost beyond belief. The intelligent auditor has educated his clients into getting their own staffs to do the checking which once his own staff had laboriously to undertake. Soon much of that burden will, in turn, be removed from clients' staffs by the growing adoption of electronic data processing. Instead of peering into the records, the auditor now stands back and gives the system which produces them a long, cool and critical look.

This would appear to be, and indeed is, progress—for auditing, once the drudgery is removed, can be exciting. Its principles are not far removed from those which govern management accounting. Instead of having his gaze concentrated on the past, the present-day auditor has to consider also both the present and the future for the methods now in use determine the degree of reliance which may be placed on records as yet unwritten.

Recognizing this modern trend, the progressive firm strives to standardize its audit programmes as far as possible and then constantly to revise them in the light of continuing experience. A shining example of this method is demonstrated in an important new book just published.<sup>1</sup> Its genesis was a printed manual written and issued to the partners and staff of a large firm of chartered accountants in 1946. Since then the text has been revised and expanded each year until, in its present form, it constitutes an authoritative practical treatise on every aspect of its subject.

Authorship on the title page is attributed to Mr VIVIAN R. V. COOPER, F.C.A., who, however, in his preface modestly points out that the manual on which the book is based is a composite work, a distillation of twenty years' collective experience. The audit procedures described are founded on five basic principles. The first is a classification of audits into five categories, the factors being the size of the job, the efficiency of management, the strength or weakness of the internal control system and the strength or absence of an internal audit department. The tests applied vary according to the category with special arrangements for the smaller unit where lack of staff makes internal control difficult or wholly impracticable. The second principle is the completion of an internal control questionnaire so that the value of the existing system may be assessed. The third is the preparation of a detailed audit programme co-ordinated with the internal control questionnaire. The fourth is the writing of letters to the client pointing out weaknesses which the audit and the assessment of the internal control system have shown up; and the fifth is the establishment of a distinctive routine for preparing, indexing and filing audit working papers and documents of verification.

Within this framework, Mr COOPER and his colleagues review the whole practice of auditing in meticulous detail. Nothing appears to have been omitted—from the types of ticks and symbols to be used to the principles to be followed in converting assets and liabilities in fluctuating foreign currencies—and nothing can be faulted. Even such domestic matters as taking audits through with partners and liaison with the taxation department are considered and the comprehensiveness of the manual may be judged by the subject-matter of the appendices which include—auditing procedures for subsidiaries of United States or Canadian companies; a summary of the statutory and Stock Exchange requirements to be observed when preparing annual company accounts; a general guide to the volume of audit tests; points to be covered in audit programmes of self-accounting branches; physical stock-taking procedures; and a specimen questionnaire designed to show the accounting principles and scope of audit applicable to accounts of subsidiaries submitted for consolidation and audited by other auditors.

All the above and much else of both general and esoteric interest is contained in Part I. Part II consists of specimen internal control questionnaires and, to complete the prescribed pattern, Part III deals with specimen audit programmes. Perhaps the most noteworthy single chapter in the book is that dealing with auditing procedures for computer applications and the pendant internal control questionnaire, not only because the material is novel and, as the author points out, still only in the experimental stage but also because of the lucidity of the explanations given. Indeed, lucidity throughout is an outstanding characteristic of this sophisticated survey and its public appearance will be welcomed by those practitioners who are conscious that their own systems stand in need of a comprehensive reappraisal.

TOTGETICAEW Portent

LAST week encompassed the high festival of English traditionalism with the organizers of Wimbledon, Henley, a test match and innumerable garden parties resting their hopes on united prayers for fine weather. Admittedly in 1966 a new – and we hope non-recurring – event was included in the timetable in the form of the end of one of the more damaging and futile industrial disputes in years, but even so, the end of June is not normally a season when reforming portents are to be expected. But it was just at this time (on July 1st to be precise) that a significant one emerged from the temporary offices of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

TOTGETICAEW – a splendid set of initials signifying the Trustees of the General Educational Trust of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales – chose that week to launch the first of a planned series of eight books on 'Management Information'. The title is Business Planning and Control, and the author is Mr S. V. BISHOP, M.C., F.C.A. Now the members of the Institute – and, it is to be hoped, of the profession and the business world in general – are already becoming accustomed to the idea of Institute publications of quality, independence and topicality: the breakthrough can be dated to the 1965 booklets on the corporation and capital gains taxes, which achieved a circulation of which many paperbacks would be proud. But this series on management information is something new because it is seeking to expand the field of the chartered accountant in his services to profit-earning management. Probably for the first time, the Institute has found in Mr BISHOP an author for an official publication who has the courage and vision to write about the role of the accountant – mid-1960s pattern – as a member of a management team which is, as the foreword puts it, 'dedicated to the achievement of ambitious objectives'.

We have no doubt that this is a portent for good for accountants, because the book makes it altogether clear that in the author's view the accountant should by now have sloughed off the 'we-do-only-what-we-are-told-as-a-service-to-management' attitude which has so often emasculated earlier writing on the provision and use of management information. Now the task of initiating proper planning for action and ensuring that organization, reporting and control procedures provide management with the right equipment to get the job done, is placed solidly upon the accountant.

There is another aspect of this TOTGETICAEW portent which is very important, and this is the clear indication that the Trustees are prepared to give an author his head and do not feel that, just because the lady with the scales appears on the cover, the views expressed must be so carefully balanced as to be devoid of personality or controversy. As a result Mr BISHOP is able to speak authoritatively – and even at times a little dogmatically – from the very first page. There are no 'ifs' and 'buts', no qualifications, no cautious caveats. The task of management in decision-taking is stated unequivocally on page 1 of Chapter I, and the role of the accountant is hammered equally clearly throughout the 108 pages of text.

Talking of the scope of careers for graduates and the extent of the demand for their services, The Sunday Times for July 3rd (in collaboration with the Careers and Advisory Centre, Cambridge) said:

'Even more significant is that the developing quantitative approach to management has produced an entirely new demand for graduates in what the Economist Intelligence Unit calls the "planning" occupations. As more and more firms realize the advantages of cost analysis, work programming, operational and market research and method and organization studies so a demand is created for statisticians, economists, accountants, systems analysts and computer programmers.'

This is fine and true, but it calls for the immediate development of a type of accountant who will not only be more positive in his approach than some of his forebears, but who will also have a much more extensive basic toolkit than ever before. Mr BISHOP should have the effect of sending a large number of accountants reeling away to books and studies on management organization and communications, decision theory, mathematics, statistics, etc. He may only have this effect on a sensitive minority, because he so carefully avoids jargon or high-pressure selling of advanced management techniques. But the implication is clear; the accountant cannot do what is needed for and with management unless he is widely equipped for an adventure in management.

This is the curtain-raiser to the General Educational Trust's eight-act presentation, which seems likely to present a greater challenge to non-practising and management consulting members than the Practice Administration series did to members in general practice. It is inevitable that the new series will create controversy – an excellent thing – just because the authors are being given the freedom to express personal views. Of course, it would be very disappointing if the profession were to accept Mr BISHOP's view in toto. His book has some of the qualities of the curate's egg; but it has to be remembered that such eggs contained the possibility of excellence which the modern lion egg is designed to avoid.

There is only one caution that we should like to express. Whilst approving whole-heartedly of the speed with which the Trustees are getting into print, and the general attempt being made by the Institute to raise the quality and attractiveness of its publications, it would be a pity if clarity and accuracy were to be lost in the process. Business Planning and Control does seem to be a little breathless in style, and also to have taken away the breath of the proof readers who have allowed too many spelling and punctuation irritations to get through. It is not as easy to read as it should be, despite apparent clarity of referencing and layout. The portent should avoid the loss of impact which minor imperfections could produce.

We are proud at this moment to be serving a profession which is clearly making a tremendous effort to put itself in a position to run with the pace-makers of industrial and commercial modernization. Mr BISHOP compares the individual's task in business with his part in sport or war. It is unfashionable at the moment to admit that any aspect of war is enjoyable, while it is still legitimate to seek enjoyment in sport. Probably what we need as a nation more than anything else is to recover a sense of genuine enjoyment in business enterprise. No doubt many accountants do enjoy their work – others not only appear not to, but probably genuinely do not do so. Mr BISHOP's kind of accountant – provided he is up to it – should get a great kick out of his work. The TOTGETICAEW portent will really have achieved something if it succeeds in teaching accountants to equip themselves to take genuine pleasure from their contributions to the economic success of the country.

Chartered Institute of Secretaries' 75th Anniversary

THE Chartered Institute of Secretaries this year celebrates its seventy-fifth anniversary and to mark the occasion a series of functions took place in London last week, attended by some five hundred members, ladies and guests.

On Thursday, a thanksgiving service was held in St Marylebone Parish Church, when the address was given by the Bishop of London, the Rt Rev. and Rt Hon. R. W. Stopford, C.B.E., D.D., D.C.L., and in the evening the President of the Institute, Lieut-Col F. W. McGuinness, T.D., F.C.A., F.C.I.S., gave a reception in the Council Chambers of the Institute at Park Crescent, London W1.

On Friday evening there was a conversazione in Guildhall comprising a ball in the Great Hall, with the Joe Loss Ambassadors Orchestra, and a classical concert in the Livery Hall at which the artists were Mr Peter Katin, pianoforte, and Miss Marisa Robels, harp. During the evening there was a champagne buffet supper.

The various functions were well supported and the celebrations as a whole proved most successful and enjoyable.

Steel Nationalization

THE timing of the Iron and Steel Bill probably owes as much to the current dispute within the Parliamentary Labour Party as to the needs of the industry. The Bill adds nothing to the picture presented by last year's White Paper concerning the future development and control of the industry.

In one respect, however, the Bill provides an unpleasant shock. The revised compensation terms are based upon the mean share prices during the sixty-one-month period between April 1961 and April 1966, or the half-year between November 1965 to April 1966 if this gives a higher value. Views as to the justice or otherwise of these terms will tend to follow Party alignments, and it need only be pointed out here that throughout this period the selling prices and hence profitability of the industry has been under the Government's direct control.

It is difficult to foresee how the industry will develop under the proposed National Steel Corporation. The White Paper made the obvious points about conducting the affairs of the body efficiently and the aim to cover its charges 'taking one year with another'. The customary and innocuous Consumer Council is provided for. The Minister's relationship with the Board will be similar to that of other Ministers to the nationalized industries. His approval will be required for the capital expenditure programme; the industry will obtain all its long-term finance from the Minister, i.e. Treasury, but it will be able to borrow short-term from other sources – always subject, however, to the consent of both the Minister and the Treasury.

The industry's total borrowing is limited to £300 million which may, with the consent of the House of Commons, be raised to £400 million. The foregoing figures for prospective borrowing are substantially larger than set out in last year's White Paper (Cmnd 2651), because during the past year the industry has raised substantial short-term loans which will need re-financing. Furthermore, revised estimates of the capital needs of the industry have been made. Vesting of the existing companies' shares will take place at latest thirty-six weeks after the Bill is passed and the Royal Assent given. Compensation will take the form of Government stock of a value equal on the day of issue to the compensation due.

Economic Appraisal

BY historical standards, comments Professor T. Wilson of the University of Glasgow in the current issue of Lloyds Bank Review, 'the post-war period has been remarkable for both stability and growth'. In the main, he asserts, instability 'has taken the form of variations in positive rates of growth'. Although the overall rate of growth in Britain has been slower than elsewhere in the world, the economy has been more stable in Professor Wilson's context. A prime factor in U.K. experience has been the tendency to allow a boom to continue for too long, given the balance of payments situation. Thus the period 1963–64 witnessed a rate of growth equal to 5½ per cent per annum, but it also produced 'a catastrophic foreign exchange crisis' and a burden of foreign debt which 'must retard growth for some time to come'.

In another article in the Review, Mr W. B. Reddaway, director of the Department of Applied Economics, Cambridge University, concludes that rising prices must be expected to continue since the forces creating these conditions are powerful and well-developed. He concedes that the prospect is not a matter for complacency but, he avers, it should not be taken too tragically so long as there is also a prospect of ever-rising real incomes. And this, in Mr Reddaway's view, seems equally assured. Few would differ from the author's views or diagnosis of the current scene, but it is more than ever necessary to stress that if we are to become reconciled to living with inflation, then the hitherto weakest sections of the community must be protected against it. In other words, pensioners, rentiers and small savers need to be given more assistance than has been the case up to now.

Building Societies in 1965

PART 5 of the Report of the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies now published (H.M.S.O. price 7s 6d) deals with building societies and shows that their assets increased during 1965 by the record figure of £669 million to £5,532 million. This was the highest percentage rate of increase since 1930.

Subscriptions to share capital amounted to £1,259 million, £239 million more than in 1964; withdrawals totalled £800 million, an increase of £128 million. At the end of 1965 there were 5,862,000 share investors with an average shareholding of £827, while borrowers totalled 2,485,000 with an average mortgage debt of £1,584.

Rates of interest for all societies in 1965, calculated on mean balances at the beginning and end of the year, were 3.87 per cent for shares and 6.63 per cent for mortgages, compared with 3.50 per cent and 6.16 per cent respectively for 1964.

There was a significant rise in the percentage of assets held as cash and investments. At the end of 1964 this had stood at 14.75 per cent compared with 16.85 per cent twelve months earlier. By the end of last year the percentage had risen again to 16.75 per cent.

The reserve ratio for building societies as a whole, that is the proportion of their general reserves and balances carried forward to their total assets, fell from 4.27 per cent at the end of 1964 to 4.18 per cent at the end of last year.

Despite the unprecedented inflow of money, the amount advanced on mortgages during 1965 was only £955 million, compared with £1,043 million in 1964. The Chief Registrar suggests that this may be partly attributed to the fact that much the greater part of the inflow took place in the later part of the year. He adds that it is understood that the amount societies had promised to lend was higher at the end of 1965 than at any previous year's end.

Parliamentary Questions

IN the Commons on July 12th, Mr John Osborn (Cons.) is to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many prosecutions he has made against private and public companies and other corporate bodies for fraudulent claims against income tax in connection with investment, initial and annual allowances for buildings and plant and machinery.

Sir Cyril Osborne (Cons.) is calling for an assurance from the Chancellor that, in view of the increasing number of take-over bids by United States concerns of British companies, he will give an assurance that he will refuse Treasury sanction in future, save in most exceptional cases, 'with a view to preventing the British economy from becoming a subsidiary of United States capital, primarily conditioned according to United States needs'.

Mr Richard Sharples (Cons.) has tabled a question to the President of the Board of Trade for July 14th, asking what progress has been made by his inspector investigating the affairs of Metrostone (Trading) Ltd.

Mr Harold Walker (Lab.) has put down a question asking whether the President will appoint inspectors to investigate the affairs of the company, D.A.W.I. Ltd, pursuant to section 165 (d) (ii) of the Companies Act 1948.

A further question on July 14th, by Mr William Hamilton (Lab.), will ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has for ensuring that banking profits are fully disclosed.

Shipbuilders' Discussions

LAST week three of the largest shipbuilders announced that they have begun talks on the feasibility of closer association. The companies concerned are Vickers, Cammell Laird, and Harland & Wolff. They say that at this stage the discussions are only exploratory.

The Geddes report published last March envisaged four or five large groups – two in the North-east, one or two on the Clyde and one on the North-west coast. Both Vickers and Cammell Laird have yards in the North-west and Vickers has a yard in the North-east which in the Geddes proposals would be hived off into the North-east group.

In the report the Harland & Wolff yard at Belfast was not included in the main groups since it is separated from the rest by the Irish Sea and can also be looked upon to some extent as a group on its own. If, however, it is to become one of a larger group, and the Geddes recommendations did not categorically exclude such a possibility, it would be drawn into a North-west rather than into one based on the Clyde and would not of course be drawn into one in the North-east.

The Minister of State, Board of Trade, said in answer to a Parliamentary question at the end of last week that he hoped to make a statement about mergers in the shipbuilding industry towards the end of this month.

Georgian Gem

THE Royal Society of Arts was founded in 1754 and, for the first twenty years of its existence, its members met in a succession of coffee houses and rented premises. In 1774, this itinerant progress ended when the Society moved into headquarters in the Adelphi built for it by the Adam brothers who were members and there it has remained. It now occupies 2, 4, 6 and 8 John Adam Street and 18 Adam Street. By 1971 it is hoped that the freehold of the entire group will be owned so that at least a small portion of the original Adams' scheme for the Adelphi will be saved from destruction.

The story of how the Society has made this contribution towards the preservation of a little of Georgian London is engagingly told in a newly-published booklet written by Mr D. G. C. Allan, Curator-Librarian of the Society<sup>1</sup>. The text is supplemented by numerous photographs and drawings which illustrate the changing tastes of the many generations who have interested themselves in the Society's welfare. The Victorians altered much of the interior but the Georgians and Elizabethans of the present century have done much towards restoring the splendid status quo. What the Victorians in their zeal failed to appreciate was that the exterior and the interior of a good Adams' building constitute one harmonious whole and that if one were turned inside out it would still look like an Adams' building, outside and in.

Capital Markets in Europe

A STUDY of the capital markets in Belgium, West Germany, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom recently published by the Economic Research Group of Amsterdam-Rotterdam Bank, Midland Bank, Deutsche Bank and Société Générale de Banque, indicates that the revival of prospects of Britain joining the Common Market has further stimulated interest in the development of the European capital markets.

In a detailed comparative study, the Economic Research Group of the four banks describes the organization and operations of the capital markets in their own countries and the role of these markets in international transactions. Throughout the survey, the emphasis is on the markets in securities quoted on stock exchanges. An attempt has been made, however, to place these markets against their economic background and special attention is given to the part they play in financing capital formation.

For each country there is an account of the market for new issues and an indication of the relative importance of the main groups of investors. The study also includes brief sections on the costs of dealing in securities and of new issues, and on the main elements in the taxation system in each country that are relevant to transactions in securities.

The concluding chapter of the study compares the main features of the national markets, examines the progress that has been made in extending the range of international capital transactions and notes the barriers that continue to obstruct the development of a European market. The Group considers that while the growth in inter-European loans indicates the underlying demand for finance on an international scale, the complexity and variety of the measures that have had to be made to meet it illustrate the size of the obstacles that still have to be overcome in constructing a more satisfactory system.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

READING the stormy headlines in the morning papers, with their devil's brew of hot and cold wars, accidents, crimes, taxes, strikes and credit squeezes, I sometimes wonder if and how the accountancy profession might offer helpful remedies.

If we seconded our best brains to serve in the cabinets of the nations; if our members were automatic choices for the posts of chancellor, comptroller, president, or prime minister; if we ordained the flow of cash and credit throughout the needy world – could we bring the millennium just a little nearer? How far might professional brains and financial expertise go towards solving the problems which beset us?

So many people, nowadays, just don't worry. They just couldn't care less. They'll get by; or it won't happen in their time; or all that is a problem for politicians or the next generation. As Louis the Fifteenth remarked callously, Après moi le déluge.

Checking up in my library on why and when he said it, in a country reeling helplessly into chaos, I found the story of an early accountant, who in his time tried to find the answers. He was John Law of Edinburgh.

Law was perhaps an accountant by courtesy only, the professional title not being formally recognized when he was born in 1671. His father was a banker and a goldsmith, and the son may well have learned from the parental practices the skills which stood him in such good stead in after life. He showed a remarkable talent in mathematics – together with, unfortunately, an over-optimistic confidence in his acumen in gambling which led to a duel, prison, and flight to escape the gallows.

Studying banking in Amsterdam, Law formed a theory about the interdependence of commerce, speculation and wealth. Having tried in vain to convince the cautious Scottish bankers of the merits of a paper currency, he had a chequered career wandering through Europe making and losing fortunes, before establishing a private bank in Paris in 1716. Its prosperity and his eloquence won the support of the Duke of Orleans, the Regent. Having just led France to the brink of bankruptcy, this nobleman was delighted to be promised solvency by a financial wizard with novel and fascinating theories.

At last an economic specialist had supplanted the bumbling amateurs of the past. John Law believed in an abundance of paper currency based on a State bank with an enormous national credit system. Soon the private bank became the Banque Royale; soon its issues of notes exceeded the entire currency of the kingdom; soon its paper became promises to pay later, rather than being redeemable on presentation. The writing was on the wall.

Centralization of control was Law's essential principle. He founded the Compagnie du Mississippi and the Compagnie des Indes, and consolidated the Banque and the companies. Next he acquired the management of the Mint, the right of coinage and the farming of the country's taxes. A feverish public rush to make easy profits followed the initial period of prosperity; speculation pushed the Compagnie's shares from an issue price of 500 livres to 20,000 livres, and in the tide of affluence Law became Counsellor of State and Controller-General of Finances. There was untold affluence for him and for everyone. Credit control and human brilliance had succeeded.

John Law himself was the only one who realized that greed had gone too far and too fast, but his desperate efforts to stop the rot precipitated disaster. In 1720 the bubbles burst. Riots, bankruptcies and national destitution followed, and Law fled from France to die poor and forgotten in 1729. Theories basically feasible had foundered on the rocks of human frailty.

It is evident that too much financial wizardry too far ahead of public understanding is worse than too little; professional panaceas require to be restrained until the time is right.

Replacement Value and Depreciation

by D. C. BEATON, C.A.

PROBABLY the most commonly used method of providing for depreciation is the 'straight-line' one. In fact, it is not so much a method of providing for depreciation, in the sense of diminution in value, as a method of allocating cost to accounting periods. The figure at which a fixed asset appears in a balance sheet under this method is not a measure of value of the asset at that date, but is the unallocated balance of cost remaining to be allocated to future accounting years.

The shortcoming of the method, that it does not measure current value, is receiving increasing attention by critics, particularly from outside the accountancy profession. The profession itself can hardly escape the growing conviction that the method does not stand up to the needs of the times when more sophisticated techniques are becoming the order of the day. No doubt the great attraction of the 'straight-line' method for accountants is its simplicity and its relative objectiveness.

If fixed assets are entered in a balance sheet at replacement value they appear at current value, and depreciation measured by reference to the difference between the replacement value of an asset at the year-end and its replacement value at the beginning of the year is expressed in terms of current cost which matches sales revenue expressed in current monetary value.

Failure of straight-line method

The 'straight-line' method fails to take into account two factors of some importance affecting the measurement of annual depreciation. The value of a fixed asset is the present value of the services it will render in the future. Since a service rendered soon is worth more than a service rendered later, the value can be likened to the present value of an annuity calculated by discounting at a compound rate of interest. After taking into account the effect of compound interest, the annual amount of depreciation is greater than what it would otherwise be by the 'straight-line' method.

The increased amount reflects the fact that the cost of the service rendered by the fixed asset includes interest, because in order to render the service it is necessary for capital to be tied up for the number of years while the asset is in use, and this provision of capital costs money in the shape of interest. However, in the financial accounts, it seems necessary to write back the interest element in the amount of depreciation if costed, because the 'interest' forms part of the profit accruing to the providers of the equity capital.

This 'interest' is an annually decreasing amount because the value of the fixed asset falls each year and consequently the amount of capital tied up falls also, in turn reducing proportionately the amount of 'interest'. The fact that the net amount in the annual accounts, i.e. the true depreciation less the writing back of the 'interest' element, tends to be smaller in the early years and in fact increases by regular progression, does not warrant the rejection of the method if it is theoretically sound, as it appears to be.

An illustration of the method may be useful at this point:

Year	Value at start £	Annuity at 5 per cent per annum compound £	Fall in value £	Interest £	Value at end £
1	1,000	367	317	50	683
3	350	367	350	17	0

A second, more important, omission of the 'straight-line' method, is that the productive efficiency of an asset tends to fall throughout its life. This fall is reflected by a decrease in value of the annual service rendered by the asset, caused in many instances by increasing expenditure, e.g. on maintenance, to keep up the standard of efficiency. To take this factor into account it is necessary to provide relatively greater amounts of depreciation in the early years.

Complications of replacement value

In attempting to enter a fixed asset at replacement value, one is immediately confronted by two obstacles. There is unlikely to be a market in second-hand plant from the current transactions in which it is possible to obtain a clear guide as to the present market value of the plant in question. Further, even in the market for new plant it is not unlikely that the new version of the old plant in question is an improved one compared with the old one when new, consequent on technological and other progress in the interval since the old plant was purchased.

It is here that the accountant, so long as his qualifications do not include those of engineering and valuing, must look to the technical engineering experts of a business to provide a reliable assessment of the points of difference between the new and the old. Even under the 'straight-line' method, the estimate of annual depreciation depends heavily on the closeness of the technical expert's forecast of effective life of an asset.

The expert would seek to find out the cost of the plant the business would buy, were it to be in the position of making the acquisition at present. In other words, it would not be the identical plant if a more efficient plant were on the market, although the difference between the price of the latter and the price of the former would in those circumstances probably be the best guide to the measurement of the inferiority of the old plant, if now new, below the more efficient new version.

The expert's report could conveniently assess the inferiority of the old plant, assumed new, as a percentage of the price of the new version. For example, if the sole element of superiority were a greater capacity, to produce, say, 100 units instead of 90 the percentage would be 10, and 10 per cent would be deductible from the price of the new version to arrive at the value of the old, if hypothetically new.

Expert assessment would be required also of the measurement of the inferiority of the old plant in question below the new version, due to the fact that a comparison is being made between old and new. Here the first main factor is the prospective useful life of the new version and the prospective useful future life of the old plant. In this assessment the expert would need to reflect his considered judgement of the effect of the factor of obsolescence, shortening what would otherwise be the length of useful life to take into account this factor. He would be called upon also to adjudge the trend of serviceability year by year due to the factor of decreasing efficiency caused by age. This could take the form of a series of yearly ratios or a graphical curve, both no doubt displaying wholly or mainly a descending tendency.

Practical example

Since it is so much easier to comprehend theory by relating this to a practical example, there follows such an example in which the data is over-simplified in the interest of clarity.

Let us assume that the existing plant to be valued has four years' life remaining, and the most efficient replacement on the market has a cost price of £652 with a prospective useful life of five years. It is further assumed that the existing plant has, or would have had if now new, 8 per cent less capacity than the replacement plant. This 8 per cent is the outcome of the technical investigation to assess the productive difference between the existing plant and the replacement. Eight per cent of £652, viz. £52, is deducted, leaving £600 as the value of the existing plant, as if new.

It is best for the technical staff to judge as closely as possible the trend of serviceability of the replacement plant and of the existing plant. For the purpose of this illustration it is assumed that the productive service rendered by the replacement is worth twice in the first year of use what that service is in the last and fifth year, and the same assumption is made for the existing plant. If it is assumed further that the decline in serviceability is by equal annual amounts, then depreciation would be worked out on the following lines.

It is more useful in the first place to work with ratios and apply discount factors thereto, because the results can be applied to any amount of value of plant. If one predicates the amount of the decline in serviceability in year five as 1, then on the given assumptions the amount of the decline in year one is 2 and the amount of decline in years two, three and four respectively 1.75, 1.5 and 1.25. If one assumes discounting factors at, say, 3 per cent per annum compound, representing the time-worth of money, then the discounted values of the factors of decline are as follows:

1	2	.9709	1.942
2	1.75	.9426	1.650
3	1.5	.9151	1.373
4	1.25	.8885	1.111
5	1	.8626	.863
	7.5		6.939

Since the existing plant has four years' life only remaining, the factors of expected annual decline in serviceability for those last four years, assumed to be the same as the expectations of the replacement plant, are:

Year	Decline in serviceability	Discount factor at 3 per cent per annum	Discounted equivalents
1	1.75	.9709	1.699
2	1.5	.9426	1.414
3	1.25	.9151	1.144
4	1	.8885	.888
	5.5		5.145

The value of the existing plant is therefore such an amount as bears the same ratio to £600 as 5.145 bears to 6.939; that is to say its value is:

$$\frac{5.145}{6.939} \times £600 = £445$$

To complete the illustration, if one moves on to the succeeding balance sheet date and makes the following assumptions (again over-simplified for the sake of clarity), that the then existing same plant has three years' life remaining; that the then most efficient replacement has a five years' life; that it would cost £652; and that the existing plant again has 8 per cent less productive capacity than the replacement plant, then the value of the existing plant, as if new, would be £652 less 8 per cent, viz. £52 = £600.

Again the aggregate discounted equivalents of the factors of annual decline in serviceability of the replacement on the same assumptions would be 6.939. Since the existing plant now has only three years' life remaining, the factors of expected annual decline in serviceability for those last three years, again on the same assumptions, would be as follows:

1	1.5	.9709	1.456
3	1	.9151	.915
	3.75		3.549

The value of the existing plant a year later has now become:

$$\frac{3.549}{6.939} \times £600 = £308$$

The diminution in value of the plant in question for the accounting year between the two balance sheet dates is the difference between its valuation at the beginning and at the end of the year, viz. £445—£308 = £137. Since the rate of interest used is 3 per cent per annum compound, the depreciation for the year chargeable to production costs, including the interest element, is £150, viz. £137 plus 3 per cent of £445 = £13, the £13 being due for writing back in the financial accounts since it forms part of the profit attributable to equity capital. The link between the two values, opening and closing, can be analysed as follows, demonstrating the factor of interest as £13:

	Factor	Plant value £
Opening .. .. .	5.145	445
Interest at 3 per cent .. ..	.154	13
	5.299	458
Depreciation .. .. .	1.75	150
Closing .. .. .	3.549	£308

THE ACCOUNTING WORLD

Company Law Reform in the Netherlands

FOLLOWING the new German Companies Act which became law last year, important changes in company legislation in the Netherlands are now under consideration. These are the subject of a most informative article by Prof. H. L. Groeneveld, of Eindhoven, in the April issue of the German journal, Die Wirtschaftsprüfung, from which we summarize some of the points closely affecting the accountancy profession.

Existing company law in Holland goes back to 1928 and no longer meets the requirements of the present-day situation brought about by the many political, economic and social changes that have taken place. Accordingly, in 1960 the Minister of Justice appointed a committee under the chairmanship of Prof. Dr P. J. Verdam to consider what reforms were needed. The committee finished its work in 1964 and has issued a report, while a number of interested groups have also published their views.

Some recommendations

In general, the balance sheet should give a true and systematic statement of the gross value and composition of the assets, as well as the result of the last trading year, in such a way that an expert opinion can be formed on the assets and profits position and the solvency and liquidity of the company. (It is explained that in Holland a distinction is drawn between the two, 'liquidity' referring to the current position, and 'solvency' to the capacity of the company to fulfil its long-term obligations.) Critics argue that the balance sheet is not primarily a proper instrument on which to base an expert opinion.

The valuation of assets and liabilities should be in accord with normal practice, and a change in the method of valuation as compared with the previous year must be expressly mentioned. The composition and analysis of the reserves should be explicitly stated – which amounts to forbidding hidden reserves.

The fact that the committee has refrained from prescribing or recommending a particular method of valuation has been criticized on the ground that it has not taken account of the widespread use of unreal valuations; moreover a publication of the Confederation of Employers contains clear recommendations on this point.

Profit and loss account

The profit and loss account – or a note on it – should give a complete picture of the company's business, either directly or by means of comparative figures. There should be specific indication of depreciation, anticipated profits, financial investments, and provision for taxation. This is in accordance with conventional views, but not with the most modern views which place special emphasis on the presentation of the figures and the way in which they are made up.

Balance sheet

In setting out the capital, mention should be made of land and buildings, machinery and plant, and also processes not yet in production. The value placed on the assets should not exceed the purchase price less depreciation. If the company owns at least one-quarter of the shares of another company, the capital value of the shares should be required to be stated. If more than half the share capital is held, then the subsidiary is bound to the fullest extent by the publication requirements of the proposed law. There may be a separate balance sheet for each undertaking or consolidated accounts, and this is an important step forward as hitherto a consolidated balance sheet has not been permissible. The names of shareholders whose holdings carry special privileges, including the nominal value of the shares held by each, should be stated, and if such shares are held by a corporation, the board of directors should be named.

The committee makes a clear distinction between reserves due to appropriation of profits and those for as yet undetermined risks and obligations which must be added to the year's charges. The committee also asks for a statement of the provision for taxes and pensions. Both these recommendations could contribute to the clarity of the balance sheet.

Publication of accounts

The committee has not proposed anything new in principle. The distinction between 'open' and 'closed' companies is preserved, although four members expressed the opinion that this distinction should be dropped for the larger companies. (In general an 'open' company is one whose shares are quoted on the stock exchange.)

The obligation to publish accounts would apply to all companies with an authorized capital exceeding 250,000 fl. and as before publication should take place by filing the balance sheet with the Regional Chamber of Commerce registry.

Audit

A proposal for compulsory audit of all companies with a share capital of over 500,000 fl. is of the greatest importance. The audit should be entrusted to an auditor on the register set up under an Act of 1962 dealing with the registration of accountants. This law is not yet wholly effective. Applications for registration can be sent in and a committee has begun to examine them, but registration has for the time being been delayed, as the position of those accountants who cannot yet be registered needs to be clarified. It may be taken for granted that the professional principles and practices enforced by the Netherlands Institute of Accountants and the Vereniging van Academisch Gevormde Accountants will – if not all specifically endorsed by statute – be generally accepted, but compulsory audit of company accounts will confer on the profession a status that it would otherwise lack. It is of interest to note that since 1961 the Amsterdam Stock Exchange has required the balance sheet and profit and loss figures quoted in prospectuses and reports to be certified by an accountant. According to a recent statement by the Netherlands Institute, 93.25 per cent of companies with quoted shares whose accounts are audited were attested by members of the two bodies mentioned.

To ensure observance of the new law the committee suggests a Companies Court at the Court of Justice in Amsterdam, consisting of members of the Court of Justice assisted by experts. This Court would examine accounts at the request of the Attorney-General or other recognized interested parties. It would have power to declare a balance sheet invalid in part or in whole, and to give instructions as to the manner in which it should be set out in future. An injunction could be granted against the company as the primary sanction and a fine would be inflicted if the instructions given were not carried out.

Auditor's responsibilities

If the idea of the Verdam Committee that the employees should be represented on the boards of companies is followed through, these representatives would have to keep in mind the general interests and not only stand up for the special interests of the employees; otherwise accountants might be involved in countless disputes in the role of deciding judge, and their own tasks would suffer.

The committee would like the authority of boards of directors to be enlarged in many respects and the responsibility for management be shared by the same people who are responsible for the balance sheet. They regard the accountant as the most suitable person to see that the accounts are drawn up in accordance with the law, but if a legally enforceable audit is imposed, the auditor may have to take into consideration opposing interests of the company and the State.

NEW ZEALAND

Research in Farm Accounting

ONE of the most ambitious research projects in the area of farm accounting yet undertaken by the accountancy profession anywhere in the world has just been completed in New Zealand.

Under the title Farm Accounting in New Zealand, a report has been prepared which should enable the standardization of farm accounts in a form acceptable not only to public accountants preparing the accounts, but to the numerous other groups using the accounts, such as lending institutions, the Inland Revenue, stock and station agents, the Department of Agriculture and producer boards. Another interesting feature of the report is a standardized four-figure classification code which will enable the report to be used by accountants using computers. A comprehensive commodity index is also included.

To ensure its acceptability to the profession drafts of the accounts were widely circulated to a cross section of public accountants throughout New Zealand. To ensure its acceptability to other interested organizations the Society's Board of Research and Publications invited representatives of the interested groups to join a drafting committee, and their assistance, both practical and financial, has been a material factor in the successful completion of the project.

The report was launched at a residential seminar held at Massey University of Manawatu from May 23rd to 26th when addresses were given and discussions held on various aspects of the recommendations. Dr H. Schapper, Reader in Agricultural Economics at the University of Western Australia, was invited to act as guest speaker at the seminar, which was opened by the Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. B. E. Talboys.

UNITED STATES

The Computer and Paperwork

THE Wall Street Journal has suggested that the ability of machines to turn out reports and multiple copies appears to have bred a new office version of Parkinson's Law. The more paperwork can be produced, the more paperwork is in fact produced. Professional accountants are specially trained to distinguish the material from the immaterial and, as advisers to management, The Journal of Accountancy urges them to see that the decision makers are not inundated by an unmanageable mass of data.

Capital Gains Tax: Deceased Estates and Settled Property – I

by F. A. BEVIS, M.A., LL.B., A.C.A.

IN dealing with the liability of deceased estates and settled property to capital gains tax, I intend going through the subject pointing out those sections of the Finance Act 1965 which establish the existence of a liability and determine its treatment.

PART I – DECEASED ESTATES

Section 19 (1) provides:

‘Tax shall be charged in accordance with this Act in respect of capital gains, that is to say chargeable gains computed in accordance with this Act and accruing to a person on the disposal of assets.’

Subsection (3) of the same section provides that the assessment for the year 1965–66 and for subsequent years of assessment shall be:

‘in respect of chargeable gains accruing in those years.’

While the Act does not define the term ‘disposal’ it may be taken to include any transference of the ownership of property, in the widest sense of that term, and any rights over property, whether revocably or irrevocably.

Thus, by section 45 (4), a hire-purchase contract is treated for capital gains tax purposes as if it were a disposal of the asset to a person as soon as he begins to use the asset with an adjustment to the tax already paid if at the end of the period of hire the property in the asset does not pass to that person.

Section 22 (1) provides a definition of the term ‘assets’ with the words:

‘All forms of property shall be assets for the purposes of this part of this Act, whether situated in the United Kingdom or not, including:

- (a) options, debts and incorporeal property generally; and
- (b) any currency other than sterling; and
- (c) any form of property created by the person disposing of it, or otherwise coming to be owned without being acquired.’

It is interesting to note that while the Act does not define the term ‘disposal’ it does, in section 22 (2), define the term ‘part disposal’.

Death

The charging section for deceased estates is section 24. By subsection (1) of this section a deceased person is ‘deemed’ to have disposed of his property at the date of his death. The subsection runs as follows:

‘On the death of an individual all the assets of which he was competent to dispose shall for the purposes of this part of this Act be deemed to be disposed by him at the date of his death, and acquired by the personal representatives or other person on whom they devolve, for a consideration equal to their market value at that date’.

By section 20 (1) an individual, to be chargeable to capital gains tax, must be resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom in the year of assessment in which the gains accrue, though by subsection (2) a person who is not resident or ordinarily resident may be chargeable on business assets if he is carrying on a trade in the United Kingdom through a branch or agency. The residence or ordinary residence ‘qualification’ is subject to the proviso in subsection (7) that individuals who, though resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom are not domiciled here shall not be chargeable to tax in respect of gains accruing from any disposal of assets outside the United Kingdom until the gains are remitted to the United Kingdom. This does not, however, apply to trustees. It follows that to be assessed to capital gains tax on death, an individual must be resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom for the year of assessment in which the death takes place. Section 43, having stated in subsection (1) that ‘resident’ and ‘ordinarily resident’ have the same meanings as in the Income Tax Acts, goes on to state in subsection (2) that an individual coming to the United Kingdom for some temporary purpose, and not with a view to establishing residence, shall only be charged to capital gains tax if the period (or periods) he is resident in the United Kingdom in that year of assessment exceeds six months.

The term ‘competent to dispose’ is defined in subsection (9) of section 24 as:

‘assets of the deceased which (otherwise than in right of power of appointment or of the testamentary power conferred by statute to dispose of entailed interests) he could, if of full age and capacity, have disposed of by his will, assuming that all the assets were situated in England and, if he was not domiciled in the United Kingdom, that he was domiciled in England.’

Two points within subsection (9) should be considered. First, it should be noted that the definition for capital gains tax purposes of ‘competent to dispose’ is in different terms from the same phrase used in the Finance Act 1894, section 22 (2) (a) and (c) for estate duty. Thus, while in the case of estate duty, property which is subject to a general power of appointment by deed is within the estate duty definition, it is not within the definition for capital gains tax purposes. This exclusion from the ambit of section 24 does not, however, exclude the assets from liability to capital gains tax since if there is a deemed realization of assets with a chargeable gain, it will be assessed under the provisions of section 25, the section which charges settled property to capital gains tax.

Secondly, infants though they cannot make a will in circumstances other than those permitting informal wills (i.e. on active service in the armed forces or a seaman at sea) are specifically brought within the area of chargeable persons.

The term 'personal representatives' is defined in section 45 as having

'the meaning assigned to it by section 423 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952.'

Section 423 (4) defines the term by reference to section 55 of the Administration of Estates Act 1925, and persons having in other countries functions in relation to the deceased corresponding to the functions of persons acting as personal representatives, as defined, in England and Wales. The term can therefore be taken as including executors and administrators of estates, but not trustees, who are dealt with separately.

The term 'other person on whom they devolve' covers the situation where under a joint tenancy the survivor takes, and the other situations such as entails (unless disposed of by the deceased's will), and an interest ceasing on death, set down in section 3 of the Administration of Estates Act 1925.

The final definition appropriate to subsection (1) of section 24 is that of 'market value'. This is fully defined in section 44, subsection (1) which states that 'market value means the price which assets might reasonably be expected to fetch on a sale in the open market.

Subsection (2) of section 44 goes on to state,

'In estimating the market value of any assets no reduction shall be made in the estimate on account of the estimate being made on the assumption that the whole of the assets is to be placed on the market at one and the same time:

'provided that where capital gains tax is chargeable or an allowable loss accrues in consequence of death and the market value of any property on the date of death taken into account for the purpose of that tax or loss has been depreciated by reason of the death the estimate of the market value shall take that depreciation into account.'

Having established the meaning attached to the main charging subsection, it is possible to consider the means by which liability is computed in accordance with the other subsections of section 24.

Subsection (2) requires that there shall be aggregated to the gains which accrue as a result of the operation of subsection (1), i.e. the deemed disposal on death, all gains accruing to the deceased by reason of disposals by him of any assets by way of donationes mortis causa, i.e. gifts made in contemplation of death and which only take effect if death actually takes place. Capital gains tax will be assessed on the amount by which the aggregate of both deemed disposals and donationes mortis causa exceeds £5,000.

This is a convenient point to note that by subsection (1) of section 45, under the heading of 'Legatee' a donationes mortis causa is to be treated as a testamentary disposition and is not to be treated as a gift.

The effect of subsection (2) is that the first £5,000 of capital gains deemed to accrue on a disposal at death are free from liability to capital gains tax. In arriving at the aggregate (a) the gains must be computed in accordance with the provisions of Schedule 6 for each asset, and (b) any allowable loss accruing in consequence of the deemed disposal on death or the donationes mortis causa are to be deducted.

'Allowable loss' is defined in section 45 as having the meaning given by section 23 of the Act which provides that losses shall be computed in the same way as the amount of a gain accruing on a disposal is computed. The effect of subsection (2) can be seen in the following examples.

Example 1

X dies on January 1st, 1966, leaving assets worth £30,000. These assets originally cost £22,000 but when valued at April 6th, 1965, they were worth £27,000.

Since the increase in value between April 6th, 1965, and January 1st, 1966, is less than £5,000, there is no liability to capital gains tax.

Example 2

If the assets in (1) had been valued at £23,000 on April 6th, 1965, there would have been an assessment for capital gains tax on £2,000, i.e.

Value at death .. .. .	30,000
Less Value at April 6th, 1965 .. ..	23,000
	<hr/> 7,000
Less Exemption .. .. .	5,000
	<hr/> <hr/> £2,000

Example 3

Y died on February 1st, 1966. It was ascertained that between April 6th, 1965, and February 1st, 1966, the assets of which Y was competent to dispose at his death had appreciated by £4,000. It was also ascertained that he had made a donationes mortis causa upon the disposal of which there was a gain of £1,250. The excess of the aggregate of £4,000 and £1,250 over £5,000, i.e. £250, will be assessable to capital gains tax.

Example 4

Z died on March 1st, 1966. It was ascertained that between April 6th, 1965, and March 1st, 1966, some of the assets of which Z was competent to dispose at his death had appreciated by £7,000 while others had depreciated by £3,000. The net gain on the deemed disposal was therefore £4,000 and since this did not exceed £5,000, there was no liability for capital gains tax.

Had the assets only depreciated by £800 there would have been an assessment on £1,200 being the gain of the £7,000 less the loss of £800.

By subsection (3) where there had been ascertained the excess of the net chargeable gains over £5,000, this excess must be added to the amount of any net gains which accrued to the deceased in the year of assessment in which the death took place for the purposes of the assessment of total net gains in accordance with section 20 (4).

Business assets

It should be mentioned here that if the full £10,000 exemption has been taken by the deceased on a transfer of business assets on retirement (he being over 60 years of age and having owned the business for the ten years prior to the disposal), then in accordance with section 34 (4) (b) the £5,000 exemption does not apply. If, however, more than £5,000, but less than £10,000 has been exempt in respect of the transfer then the deductible exemption allowed on death by section 34 (4) (a) is limited to the difference between the amount of the exemption used in respect of the transfer and £10,000. The effect of this is shown in the following table:

Age on retirement	Chargeable gain £	Appropriate relief £	Chargeable £	Restriction (section 34 (4)) £	Exemption (section 24 (2)) £
60 years	20,000	Nil	20,000	Nil	5,000
61 years	20,000	2,000	18,000	Nil	5,000
62 years	20,000	5,000	15,000	Nil	5,000
6 months
63 years	20,000	6,500	13,500	1,500	3,500
3 months
64 years	20,000	9,500	10,500	4,500	500
9 months
65 years	20,000	10,000	10,000	5,000	Nil

It is apparent that section 34 only applies on a disposal 'by way of sale or gift' so that the provisions of the section will not apply to a deemed disposal on death under section 24. In these circumstances persons over the age of 62½ having business assets with a likely chargeable gain in excess of £5,000 should review their situation if the maximum advantage is to be taken of the £10,000 exemption which is available, for otherwise, if they die 'in harness' the exemption will be restricted to £5,000.

Rate of tax

The net gains assessable to capital gains tax in the year of assessment in which death occurs will normally suffer tax at the rate of 30 per cent of the net capital gain in accordance with section 20 (3). However, an alternative basis may be applied which will be beneficial in cases where the deceased received only a small income in the year of assessment in which death occurred. It will therefore be seen that the sooner persons die after April 6th in any year the smaller will be their income if it accrues evenly over a financial year, and the greater is the likelihood that the alternative basis will be advantageous. As the size of an estate increases, however, any benefit is reduced. From the point of view of tax planning it would seem wise for trustees of a discretionary trust to delay the date of making their payments until the latest time possible in any financial year, though there may be cases where such an advantage can only be achieved with the indulgence of the beneficiary's bank manager.

Alternative basis

The alternative basis is laid down in section 21 (1). The amount of capital gains tax is to be an amount equal to the income tax and surtax which would have been chargeable under Case VI of Schedule D:

'(a) where the amount on which he would have been chargeable to capital gains tax for that year under the last foregoing section does not exceed five thousand pounds, on a sum equal to one-half of that amount; and

(b) where that amount exceeds five thousand pounds on a sum equal to two thousand five hundred pounds plus the excess of that amount over five thousand pounds.'

The significant words in that part of the subsection quoted are:

'he would have been chargeable to capital gains tax for that year.'

Thus the figure to be taken is the total net gains for the year, not the net gains on death.

Example 5

E died on June 1st, 1965, having earned and unearned income for 1965-66 of £200. Net capital gains made 1965-66 before death were £2,800. Net capital gains at death amounted to £4,000.

It is sufficient to say in a paper covering as wide a heading as this does that there are additional provisions in section 21 covering losses and the method of computation in the case of gains of married women. However, it should be pointed out that in establishing whether to apply the alternative basis there must be excluded, in accordance with subsection (5), from the total of net gains made by the deceased before death, any gains resulting from the disposal of an asset acquired (otherwise than as legatee) not more than two years before the relevant disposal from a person who by Schedule 7, paragraph 21, was a person connected with the deceased.

Losses

We now come to the consideration of losses. Losses suffered in the year of assessment in which the deceased died fall basically into two categories,

(i) those losses resulting from disposals by the deceased before death; and

(ii) those losses resulting from:

(a) deemed disposals on death; and

(b) donationes mortis causa (which as mentioned before are to be treated as testamentary dispositions).

In so far as any losses which arise on death or by reason of a donatio mortis causa are unrelieved after setting them against assessable gains under subsection (2) of section 24, they may, by subsection (4), be added to any losses sustained by the deceased in consequence of any disposals by him before death, in the year of assessment in which the death occurs, and set against any assessable gains which resulted from disposals made before death.

Example 7

H died on December 1st, 1968.

(i) Between April 6th, and December 1st, 1968, H disposed of assets which resulted in gains of £12,000 and losses of £600.

(ii) Shortly before death H made donationes mortis causa which resulted in gains of £200 and losses of £2,000.

(iii) At death H was deemed to have disposed of assets which resulted in gains of £350 and losses of £3,500.

Where losses sustained in the year of assessment in which death occurs, either by deemed disposals or from disposals before death by the deceased, are unrelieved, they may, by subsection (5), be carried back and be set off against any chargeable gains accruing to the deceased in the three years of assessment preceding the year of assessment in which the death occurs. Such losses are to be set off against the gains accruing in the later years of the three before the earlier years. Where losses have been set off against the chargeable gains of the three years of assessment before that in which death occurred and there still remain unrelieved losses, no further relief is available. It should be noted that where a death occurs in the year 1965-66, and losses are unrelieved in that year of assessment, there are no earlier years of assessment against the gains of which the losses may be set.

Example 8

J died in September 1969 with unrelieved losses of £2,250. In the years of assessment before death J made the following net capital gains:

1965-66 .. ..	500
1966-67 .. ..	750
1967-68 .. ..	900
1968-69 .. ..	250

The unrelieved losses in 1969-70 will be set against the following gains:

1968-69 - gain .. ..	250
1967-68 - gain .. ..	900
1966-67 - gain .. ..	750
	1,900
Unused losses .. ..	350
	£2,250

We now have to consider the position of chargeable gains and losses during the period of administration by personal representatives.

So far as net gains are concerned, these will all suffer the full capital gains rate of 30 per cent since the alternative basis of calculating liability under section 21 (1) is not available to personal representatives.

Under the provisions of subsection (8) of section 24, where the personal representatives of a deceased person suffer losses in the three years following the death, and it should be noted that this is three years from the date of death and not three years of assessment following the death, these losses in so far as they cannot be set against chargeable gains in that period of three years, may be deducted from chargeable gains which accrued to the deceased in the year of assessment in which the death occurred, or in the preceding three years of assessment, taking the chargeable gains in a later year before those which accrued in an earlier year.

Once again it is pertinent to note that where in the three years following a death in 1965-66 there are unrelieved losses during the administration by personal representatives and no gains in the year in which the death occurred there is no means of obtaining relief for these unrelieved losses. This does in fact produce no hardship since if the losses are unrelieved there can have been no capital gains tax paid in an earlier year.

It was convenient above to deal with the treatment of gains and losses of personal representatives directly after considering those of the deceased. It is, however, appropriate to consider now the position of personal representatives.

Personal representatives

By section 24 (1) the deceased at death is deemed to have disposed of his assets and the personal representatives are deemed to acquire them at their market value. We have earlier considered the definition of personal representatives found in section 45. Additional mention of their position is given in section 24 (6) where it is stated:

'In relation to property forming part of the estate of a deceased person the personal representatives shall for the purposes of this part of this Act be treated as being a single and continuing body of persons (distinct from the persons who may from time to time be the personal representatives), and that body shall be treated as having the deceased's residence, ordinary residence and domicile at the date of death.'

Despite the wording of subsection (6) personal representatives are not deemed to be individuals in their representative capacity, since in Schedule 10, paragraph 12 (2), the Act states that personal representatives shall not be regarded as individuals (except in circumstances of nominees and absolute trustees under section 22 (5)). It is this paragraph which excludes the personal representatives from adopting the alternative basis of being charged under section 21 (1). A further effect of this paragraph is that personal representatives of a foreign domiciled deceased will not be able to take advantage of the remittance rule under section 20 (7) which only applies to individuals.

Having mentioned the effect of part 2 of Schedule 10, paragraph 12, it is convenient to consider the other aspects of that paragraph. Paragraph 12 (1) states, in regard to personal representatives, that they may be assessed and charged in respect of the capital gains of the deceased in the name of any one of them. Where, however, such an assessment is made the persons assessed do not include a person who is not resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. It is important to note that paragraph 12 (3) provides for the alternative basis of charging to be available in computing the liability for capital gains tax on the deemed disposal on death even though the tax on any gain will be chargeable and assessable on the deceased's personal representatives.

Legatees

We now come to consider the position of legatees. Section 45 provides the following definition of a legatee:

'“legatee” includes any person taking under a testamentary disposition or on an intestacy or partial intestacy, whether he takes beneficially or as trustee, and a donatio mortis causa shall be treated as a testamentary disposition and shall not be treated as a gift.'

Section 24 (7) provides that no chargeable gain shall accrue to the personal representatives when a legatee acquires an asset, and further that the legatee shall be regarded as having acquired the asset at the time it was acquired by the personal representatives, i.e. the 'cost price' on a subsequent disposal by the legatee will be the value of the asset at the date of death of the deceased, or in cases where the personal representatives have purchased assets, at the cost of the asset when purchased.

Example 9 (Schedule 6, paragraph 22)

K died on October 6th, 1963, leaving 10,000 shares valued at £2 each in X Ltd a quoted company. On June 6th, 1964, when the shares were valued at £2 10s each the personal representatives transferred these shares to L, the residuary legatee, as part of the residuary estate. On April 6th, 1965, the shares were valued at £4 10s each. On October 6th, 1965, L sold the shares when they had a value of £4 10s each. L is deemed to have acquired the shares at the time when the personal representatives acquired them, i.e. on K's death - October 6th, 1963. The chargeable gain is therefore 10,000 (£4 10s - £2) = £25,000.

Example 10 (Schedule 6, paragraph 24)

Assume the same facts as in example 9, but X Ltd an unquoted company. As before L is deemed to acquire the shares when the personal representatives acquired them. However, the chargeable gain is calculated on the proportion of the gain deemed to accrue between April 6th, 1965, and the date of disposal assuming an even increase in value throughout the period of ownership.

$$\frac{6}{18+6} \times 10,000 \times (£4 \text{ 10s} - £2) = £6,250.$$

Personal representatives will accordingly be chargeable on any gains accruing to them when they dispose of assets,

e.g. by sale or transfer, to any person other than a legatee. Where residuary legatees take assets in specie, they will take as legatees. Subsection (11) provides that a deed of family arrangement executed within two years of the death will have the effect that a disposition made under the deed will not be treated as a disposal for capital gains tax purposes.

When personal representatives assent to trustees either to themselves or to other persons as trustees there is no deemed disposal since trustees are within the definition of legatees under section 45 with the result that the value at which they acquire assets is the value as at the date of the deceased's death. Where, however, an estate continues to be unadministered it may avoid the effect of a deemed disposal on the death of a life-tenant, with the result that the ultimate beneficiaries take as legatees. Whether or not it is advantageous to prolong the administration of an estate will depend on the circumstances of the case, particularly when the deceased was not domiciled, resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom and the trusts of the will are not to be non-resident trusts, for while the personal representatives take the domicile, residence and ordinary residence of the deceased, trustees take their own residence and ordinary residence in conjunction with where the trust is administered.

Cost and expenses

Before dealing with the question of estate duty, it seems appropriate to say a few words on the subject of expenses and costs incurred by personal representatives, legatees and beneficiaries.

The rules for determining what expenditure is allowable in computing the chargeable gain, are set out in paragraph 4 of Schedule 6. The following points should be noted in connection with this paragraph.

- (i) the provisions of the paragraph only apply when there has been an actual disposal. Section 45 (9) provides that:

'Any provision in this part of this Act introducing the assumption that assets are sold and immediately re-acquired shall not imply that any expenditure is incurred as incidental to the sale or re-acquisition.'

- (ii) by paragraph 4 (2) relief for allowable expenditure is restricted to those persons who incurred the expenditure - subject to paragraph 16;
- (iii) the expenditure must have been 'wholly and exclusively' incurred for the (1) acquisition and provision, and (2) enhancement in value, establishment, preservation or in defence of the asset. The plethora of cases dealing with the interpretation of section 137 (a) of the Income Tax Act 1952 may provide a guide;
- (iv) since the expenditure to be deductible must 'enhance the value' of the asset and be reflected in the state of the asset at the time of disposal, any abortive expenditure will not be deductible.

Paragraph 16 provides some relaxation of the rules of paragraph 4 in connection with expenditure incurred by personal representatives in:

- (i) computing the chargeable gain which accrues on the deemed disposal of assets at death; and

- (ii) the disposition of the assets by the personal representatives either by sale or by distribution to legatees.

This is, of course, an exception to the provision in section 45 (9). The effect of this paragraph is that any expenditure which is within the ambit of paragraph 4 (2) and which has been incurred in relation to the disposition of assets which were deemed to be disposed, shall be deducted in computing the chargeable gain, if the personal representatives make a claim.

A similar right to deduct allowable expenditure is given to a legatee (and to a beneficiary on becoming absolutely entitled as against the trustees of settled property) when he disposes of property he acquired as a legatee.

Estate duty

It is provided in section 26 (1):

'In determining the value of an estate for the purposes of estate duty allowance shall be made for capital gains tax chargeable on chargeable gains accruing on the death in consequence of the provisions of section 24 (1) (as well as of any amount of capital gains tax owed by the deceased).'

In other words capital gains tax payable on (a) assets deemed to be disposed at death, and (b) assets disposed of by the deceased before death, shall be deductible in arriving at the value of the estate upon which estate duty will be paid.

Subsection (2) provides that capital gains tax shall be deducted from the value of settled property passing on a death so far as the tax falls to be paid out of the property passing or to be borne by any person to whom the property passes for any beneficial interest in possession.

Subsection (3) provides that where the value of an asset passing on death falls to be ascertained under section 7 (5) of the Finance Act 1894 for the purpose of determining estate duty, and the market value of the asset at the date of death has been fixed for the purpose of determining a chargeable gain or an allowable loss, the value so fixed shall be taken as the value for estate duty purposes.

Subsection (3) is, however, subject to subsection (4) in so far as where, as in the case of a section 55 assets valuation, section 7 (5) of the Finance Act 1894 is modified by other enactments, then subsection (3) will not apply. Thus, where the shares in a close company pass on death and section 55 applies, though the assets valuation must be used for estate duty purposes, the shares must be valued for capital gains tax purposes.

With regard to the contents of the Inland Revenue affidavit, the Board of Inland Revenue have issued a notice stating that for the purposes of death after April 6th, 1965:

'Although the amount of the tax may not be ascertained until some time later, deduction in the Inland Revenue affidavit or account, on which estate duty is tendered, of a reasonable estimate of the tax liability will be accepted, subject to correction in due course. If estate duty is paid without any deduction for capital gains tax, the Estate Duty Office will, in due course, repay without interest any estate duty attributable to the tax and will not, for this purpose, require the delivery of a corrective affidavit or account.'

Thus, in order to get an early grant of probate or letters of administration a personal representative should discover whether the deceased's chargeable assets could have appreciated more than £5,000 since April 6th, 1965. If they could not, no deduction should be made. If they could, 30 per cent of the net gains can be deducted.

Postponement of payment of tax

At this point it is appropriate to observe that Schedule 10, paragraph 4 (1) provides for the postponement of the payment of capital gains tax in two sets of circumstances. The first is on the disposal of assets deemed to have been disposed of by a deceased person on his death; the second, is in connection with settled property, which I shall deal with later.

The opportunity to postpone payment is restricted to tax payable on the following classes of assets:

- (i) land or an estate or interest in land;
- (ii) shares valued for estate duty on an 'assets' basis under section 55, Finance Act 1940;
- (iii) unquoted shares not valued on an 'assets' basis in circumstances where the Board of Inland Revenue are satisfied that they cannot be disposed of without undue hardship to the beneficiaries.

Where these requirements exist, personal representatives (or trustees) may pay the tax chargeable by eight equal yearly instalments or sixteen half-yearly instalments, subject to the payment of interest under sections 495 to 497 of the Income Tax Act 1952.

Sub-paragraph (2) of this paragraph provided that the first instalment is due at the expiration of twelve months from the time of the deemed disposal and the interest of the unpaid portion shall be added to each instalment and paid accordingly. However, the tax unpaid, together with any interest due, may be paid at any time. If the property is disposed of for valuable consideration, all money outstanding becomes due and payable on the disposal.

Sub-paragraph (3) of this paragraph provides that where the £5,000 relief has been used under section 24 (2) in respect of the aggregate sum, including gains in the three classes of assets and other gains, then in determining the amount of tax which may be paid by instalments, the relief shall be treated as having been applied rateably in respect of tax on those respective gains.

Drafting of wills

Consideration should be given in the future drafting of wills to the incidence of capital gains tax. The Finance Act provides for capital gains tax to be a deduction in computing the liability of the estate. Unless the will directs otherwise, the incidence of the tax will reduce the amount of the residuary estate. One can visualize a situation in the future where, for example, a testator has left all the shares in the family company to his children and the residue of his estate including his residence, to his widow. Where there is a gain rendering a liability to capital gains tax on these shares at the testator's death it may be that the residuary estate will be worthless. There is a further irony in this, for if the residuary estate is worthless the residence, which was free from capital gains tax at death, will have been used to provide the cash required to pay the appropriate tax. It seems wise that in future some provision should be made in wills for legatees to bear the capital gains tax on the assets they receive. It may also be prudent for testators to execute codicils to existing wills to achieve the same effect.

(To be concluded.)

Cunard's problems

THE accounts of The Cunard Steam-Ship Co Ltd, which form this week's reprint, show amongst other things, what a shattering experience the recent shipping strike must have been for the company. The actual losses during the strike and the effect of the strike on subsequent operations can as yet only be estimated but it will be a figure in millions; indeed, the chairman, Sir Basil Smallpeice, F.C.A., stated at the annual meeting last week that 'the cost so far cannot have been less than £3 million and may be as high as £4 million'.

The key to the already difficult position in which Cunard is placed, irrespective of the strike, is demonstrated clearly enough in 'Group statistics 1956-65'. For four years up to the end of 1965 the passenger ships of Cunard Line have been operating at a loss of an extent that has only marginally been offset by cargo ship and other operations.

The earnings performance over the past four years must, of course, be seen alongside the amount of capital employed in the group. The return on capital employed is virtually non-existent. This year a heavy loss looks inevitable. The inevitable question is how long Cunard can continue to operate the services on which the company's earnings were traditionally based and for which the Cunard name traditionally stands.

Necessary exercise

Sir Basil Smallpeice took over the chairmanship of the group last year and is endeavouring, through internal reorganization, improvement of management and an objective of putting the passenger shipping side right, to pull Cunard round. He is to be congratulated on deciding to give the company's stockholders a clear — and inevitably cold — look at the company's position.

'I hold the view', he says, 'that stockholders in any company should be given enough relevant information to enable them to form a proper judgement about their company and its problems and prospects.' The position of Cunard, he admits, 'cannot be described as other than still a matter for serious concern.' It is as well that stockholders should know the position.

The revenue figures and the trading results of the three main operating subsidiaries and the statement of capital employed are all given to Cunard stockholders for the first time. That the exercise is a chilling one from the stockholders' viewpoint probably makes it all the more necessary.

Reviewing the position

The nub of the group's problem, as the figures show only too clearly, is the continuing loss on Cunard Line's passenger ships. This situation, Sir Basil says, is often attributed to the age of certain of the ships, but he considers that this is incorrect. The 'Queens', despite their age, have earned an enviable reputation for comfort and service which is standing up well against the competition of rivals' newer ships.

Losses apply to almost all passenger ships currently in Atlantic service. Losses are due primarily to the fact that while jet aircraft have substantially captured the purely transport market, passenger shipping has not yet adapted itself in this sphere for survival in the jet air age.

Management consultants, Urwick, Orr & Partners, are working on a review of the whole of Cunard's passenger selling organization with a view to installing in Cunard Line the most modern marketing methods, and the Economist Intelligence Unit has been commissioned to establish,

The Cunard Steam-Ship Company Limited
(a) Loan	24,296	25,427
Subsidiary Companies
(b) Loans	1,210	1,693
(c) 3½% Guaranteed First Mortgage debenture stock	332	363
	25,838	27,483

(a) In view of the magnitude of the amounts involved the financing of the new Cunarder required special arrangements. Accordingly a loan was arranged on the security of a charge on the ship-building agreement and on the ship as she is constructed, by statutory mortgages of 5 passenger ships and 6 cargo ships and a charge on their insurances. This loan does not bear interest, but a commitment fee was paid when it was obtained; it is repayable during the period of construction and to assist in this repayment the company has arranged to borrow from a consortium of British bankers on the same security up to £17,600,000 at the rate of ½% over bank rate, minimum 5% per annum.

The loan from the consortium is repayable on completion of the ship or 31 May 1969, whichever is sooner, and to meet this repayment the company has arranged a secured loan under the terms of the Government's Shipbuilding Credit Scheme of up to £17,600,000 at the rate of 4½% per annum repayable over 10 years. It is contemplated that the ship will be completed in 1968, but the Government's commitment to make the loan remains valid provided completion is effected by 31 May 1969. The repayment of the consortium loan and the taking up of the Government loan could be extended beyond 31 May 1969 in certain circumstances.

(b) These loans, carrying interest at the rate of ½% over bank rate, minimum 5% per annum, are secured by mortgages of 2 cargo ships and are repayable by instalments up to 1968.

(c) The 3½% Guaranteed First Mortgage debenture stock is redeemable on or before 1 April 1984 at par.

firstly, whether there is a case for believing that a worthwhile market would continue to exist and, if so, secondly, to establish the outline of commercial policy that would enable Cunard to exploit the market profitably.

Basic facts

The basic facts of competition on trans-Atlantic passenger carrying are indisputable. In 1957 the number of passengers crossing the North Atlantic by sea was 1 million but by 1965 it had fallen to 650,000. During the same period the number crossing the Atlantic by air rose from 1 million to 4 million. Whereas the ratio of sea to air in 1957 was 50:50, by 1965 it had fallen to 14:86.

Progressive reduction in air fares makes it increasingly difficult for sea to compete with air simply as a means of trans-Atlantic transport. Cunard is a minority holder in B.O.A.C.-Cunard and, while this gives Cunard a stake in trans-Atlantic air operations, the interest, so far as Cunard's finances are concerned, is purely one of dividend received.

The shipping strike had just begun when Cunard's accounts were issued and it was estimated then to be costing Cunard about £ $\frac{1}{2}$  million a week. In such circumstances Sir Basil admitted that 'nothing can avert a loss in 1966'. It remains to be seen whether or not the shipping strike proves to be the last straw in Cunard's valiant attempts at North Atlantic survival.

The prime essential is to put existing ships at least on a break-even basis before the Q4, being built by John Brown, is delivered in 1968. Cunard's problems could be boiled down to - 'break even' or 'break up'.

CITY NOTES

THE steel compensation 'scandal' has given the Stock Exchange something different to argue about this week. The compensation prices when announced were fairly well in line with the prices actually quoted on the market immediately before the terms were made known.

That meant that jobbers had to drop prices to the extent of commission, stamp duty and the dealing margin. But the fact that prices quoted were virtually on a par with the compensation prices announced showed readily enough that last year's provisionally stated compensation terms were considered well and truly out.

The market seems to have got its arithmetic out of line with that of the Civil Servants in elongating the average price period, the officials having taken prices up to the point of the Queen's Speech when the renationalization mandate was renewed.

Only Government, of course, could get away with a take-over on this kind of basis but, with a majority of one hundred in the House of Commons, Governments can and do get away with this kind of financial 'murder'. A reduction in compensation was always on the cards and the City had allowed for it - but insufficiently.

Most noise, naturally, has come from those who were speculating heavily before the compensation terms were announced. Forewarned on this occasion was not sufficiently forearmed.

The Pricing of Government Contracts

This memorandum by the Research and Technical Committee of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants is the subject of a leading article on another page.

Introduction

OVER a year has passed since the publication of the Second Report of the Inquiry into the Pricing of Ministry of Aviation Contracts. (Second Lang Report.)<sup>1</sup> Meanwhile there is evidence that the process of price negotiations between Government departments and industry has slowed down. Such a state of affairs is hardly in keeping with the urgent need to encourage industrial development on sound lines.

2. The Lang Inquiry was confined by its terms of reference to investigating a specific case in which the profit allowed to a contractor was considered excessive and to recommending whether any changes in organization or procedure would be necessary to ensure a better assessment of prices for similar contracts in the future. The circumstances which gave rise to the inquiry have naturally tended to focus attention on pricing procedures. In order to view the matter in sound perspective, however, it is necessary to appreciate that the problem of ensuring a better assessment of contract prices is only one aspect of the wider problem of developing a closer understanding between Government and industry. This is of great importance if the Government is to foster successfully its National Plan and encourage industry in achieving greater productivity and competitive prices whilst earning a reasonable return on capital employed.

3. Certain studies are now being carried out in connection with the pricing of Government contracts. As The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants is primarily concerned with cost and management accountancy throughout industry, the Institute's Research and Technical Committee, with the approval of the Council, has given consideration to the problem. Its views on certain basic issues are now published as a contribution to present thinking on the subject. In particular these issues include:

- (a) the method of assessment of profit to be allowed to the contractors;
- (b) equality of information at the time of pricing a contract;
- (c) the inherent difficulties in estimating, costing and cost control for certain types of Government contracts and the effect of these difficulties.

Government/industry relationship

4. In carrying out any contract an efficient company naturally expects that the price will enable it to earn a fair reward taking into account such factors as initiative, risk, efficiency and technological skills. On the Government side, the department concerned must be in a position to satisfy itself that it is getting value for money. To both parties the methods by which costs, prices and profits are calculated are of prime importance.

The profit formula

5. A fundamental issue in the Government/industry relationship in the matter of pricing contracts is undoubtedly the use of a profit formula devised about twenty years ago which is regarded in industry as unsound and inequitable under present-day conditions. Its survival for so long during a period of increasing technological complexity has entailed the securing by negotiation of better treatment than that which the formula itself would have given. It is reasonable to assume that to ensure full co-operation by industry in devising and adopting better methods of pricing and controlling the cost of Government contracts, it is essential to have a profit formula which is recognized as being more in line with present-day conditions. It is pertinent therefore to review the formula and its implications.

6. Briefly stated, according to paragraph 53 of the Second Lang Report the formula provides for profit to be calculated as follows:

- (a) Non-risk contracts – normally those which are priced on the basis of actual cost. The contractor is allowed  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent per annum on capital employed. This is multiplied by capital employed and divided by cost of production to give an equivalent percentage of profit on cost.
- (b) Risk contracts – normally production contracts for which prices are based on estimates. To the percentage on cost determined as for non-risk contracts may be added up to 2 per cent for risk and up to 2 per cent for efficiency.
- (c) The total profit allowed on non-risk contracts is normally restricted to 10 per cent per annum on capital employed and on risk contracts to a maximum of 15 per cent per annum on capital employed. These maximum rates, however, are exceptional.

7. In practice the percentage for risk may be eliminated or restricted when price negotiations take place at a late stage in the contract. Furthermore, there are instances of the allowance for risk being applied as a percentage of capital employed, instead of a percentage on cost of production; in other cases the 2 per cent for efficiency has not been allowed when it could have been justifiably claimed had the contractor known of this entitlement. Because of non-disclosure by Government departments in the past there has been lack of knowledge by contractors of the 'official' formula and their entitlements under it. Disparities in the application of the 'official' formula were not emphasized in the Lang Report and the report did little to clarify how efficiency was measured.

8. The percentages allowed by the 'official' profit formula fail to recognize the demands made upon profits by inflation and the necessity for replacing assets at present-day prices. In fact, a company wholly engaged on Government contracts, turning over its capital once every year, assuming that it qualified for the maximum scale of profits and served its capital at 6 per cent per annum, would suffer the depletion of its assets year by year until it could no longer continue in business. This is illustrated simply by the following figures:

	Maximum risk rate Per cent	Maximum non-risk rate Per cent
Profit allowed (per cent on capital employed) .. .. .	11.5	7.5
Less Taxation, say 40 per cent. .	4.6	3.0
	6.9	4.5
Less Service of capital at say 6 per cent gross .. ..	6.0	6.0
	0.9	-1.5
Less Cost of inflation, say ..	3.0	3.0
	-2.1	-4.5
Annual depletion of assets ..

This can be expressed in another way, namely, that in order to provide a growth rate of 5 per cent per annum from self-generated funds, after servicing capital at 6 per cent per annum and allowing only 3 per cent per annum for inflation, it would be necessary to earn on both risk and non-risk contracts, an average of 23 per cent per annum before tax at 40 per cent.

The position regarding the adequacy of profits and depletion of assets can in fact be worse than the above figures convey, when it is taken into consideration that the Government may not admit some costs which the contractor regards as essential for efficient production.

9. Paragraph 59 of the Second Lang Report states that there is an advantage to the Government in having a profit formula to give guidance to contract officers and that criticisms made by industry can be met by a liberal interpretation of the formula. Where such discretion is given to Government officers it could not be other than helpful to have clear guide lines as to the limits of their powers in this connection. Their position would appear to be embarrassing when they are attempting to correct, by the exercise of discretion, deficiencies in an official formula, the equity of which is in dispute. Equally it is important to contractors that they should know not only their obligation but also their entitlements when undertaking Government contracts.

10. In devising an equitable profit formula it is essential that the definition of capital employed should be clear and unambiguous. Capital employed may be defined in different ways according to its various purposes, but in connection with pricing negotiations with the Government, it is submitted that it should be based on the assets employed in the business or more appropriately in the execution of Government contracts.

11. The profit formula should take proper cognizance of the risks which a contractor must accept and it should provide adequate reward for efficiency.

12. The risk element may be less than that in commercial trading in respect of bad debts and to the extent that purchase commitments, stock redundancy and obsolescence may be covered by break clauses in the contract. On the other hand, risk of losses resulting, for example, from reduced output following changes in Government policy may be greater than those operating in commercial markets. Where there is a high fixed investment in expensive facilities and skilled staff associated with the manufacture of Government supplies, the results of disruption in demand can be serious.

13. It is obviously difficult to define the efficiency element in precise terms. On the other hand it is possible to lay down factors which should be taken into account. Such factors should include:

- (a) effective control of costs;
- (b) technical excellence of products;
- (c) achievement of an adequate standard of quality and reliability;
- (d) maintenance of development and production programme;
- (e) maintenance of delivery dates;
- (f) the ability to take on difficult 'one-off' jobs;
- (g) willingness to undertake research and study contracts which will not lead to production contracts, and for this purpose to set up establishments to serve the Government need in excess of facilities which would be required for commercial purposes.

The allowance for efficiency should ensure that inventiveness in improving manufacturing methods and reducing costs is not inhibited.

As it is not possible to measure all these factors precisely, proper scope should be allowed for negotiating reasonable risk and efficiency elements in contracts. It is worthy of consideration that the maximum profit factor should be allowed only to contractors achieving these objectives, obtaining high export performance and demonstrating, by the quality of information, their good faith and honesty of purpose.

14. To sum up, the following matters should be the subject of detailed study resulting in clear definition which should be communicated in full to industry as well as to Government officials engaged in price negotiations:

- (a) the basic profit factor applicable to the industry;
- (b) guide rules for determining the added percentages for risk and efficiency, including performance and control of costs;
- (c) capital employed and what is included in it or excluded from it.

Equality of information

15. It is believed that a satisfactory resolution of the profit problem could be a major factor in achieving a closer co-operation in respect of voluntary disclosure of information at the time contracts are priced.

16. In the evidence given to the Lang Committee emphasis was placed on the practical difficulties inherent in the cost control of certain types of production, but little or no evidence appears to have been given as to the methods by which industry does in fact control similar jobs in the commercial field. The information available to management for the control of its business will naturally depend largely on the type of business, the management structure and the company's philosophy of control. It is essential that flexibility be maintained in order to keep abreast of competition and new techniques as they become available in this technological age.

17. Accounting and costing may be described as arts or at best inexact sciences, calling for something more in their application than just technical professional competence. Judgement and a sense of 'rightness' are most important in the constantly changing demands for management information; it is essential that control information required for Government price negotiation does not impose a strait-jacket on management accounting and control techniques.

18. The problem of estimating and costing in some types of production is so complex that no amount of control imposed from outside will ever achieve equality of information except at the cost of strangling initiative. In these circumstances the only alternative is to secure the right conditions for complete honesty of purpose and good faith between the contracting parties.

Estimating, costing and cost control

19. The methods of estimating and costing proposed in the Lang Report provide little practical assistance in solving the problem of setting down a basis for assessing a fair and reasonable price. The pricing methods discussed in the report as alternatives to 'fixed prices based on estimates', almost without exception require historic or job costing. What has not been brought out is that job costing is often inaccurate and is of little use for management control purposes. The enforcement of this technique on industries using more modern methods will lead to considerable inefficiency: in the majority of cases it will not achieve the purposes for which it was imposed. Normally, job costing is employed only if no more practical method of cost control is available.

20. Management accountants have for many years employed systems of budgetary control and standard costing and in more recent times costs and inefficiencies have been attacked by cost control procedures. PERT, critical path network analysis techniques and operational research activities have also been prominent in a ceaseless drive for greater efficiency.

These control techniques have as their principal objectives the measurement of performance against a predetermined plan and assistance in selecting the most efficient of a number of plans. Planning itself will of course be only as good as the estimates on which it is based. There is unfortunately a shortage of good estimators both in Government departments and in industry where there is a demand to meet the growing volume of business in the more sophisticated industries.

21. The approach to technical costing appears to have varied in the past, Government representatives having in some cases prepared their own independent estimates and in other cases having checked the contractor's estimates. Whichever method is adopted the findings should be disclosed to the contractor and discussed with him. In the case of some complex products, control of costs may be exercised by the progressive introduction of estimates as manufacture of piece parts progresses; a composite estimate for the assemblies making up the whole product may become available only when production is well under way. In the interim, the basis for control of costs may be in terms of time, tasks or volume of output against targets at shop floor level and by control of quality, scrap and rejects. Furthermore, the focus may be on the causes of excess times, costs or quantities arising in a particular production shop, rather than on isolating the costs to a particular contract. Emphasis can be switched when one cause of trouble has been brought under control and possibly at no time would there be any need to focus on 'savings' unless it were apparent that the estimates or targets were too loose. In these circumstances and with this cost control philosophy any attempt to collate so-called 'actual costs' for a particular contract, especially within a company working both on Government and commercial contracts, would involve a massive duplication of accounting routines and a diversion of management effort.

22. The whole crux of control is good estimating whether it be for the costs of materials, of shop floor activities, of tooling, of research and development effort, of the elements of overhead, or of the volume and pricing of turnover.

These are interdependent factors contributing to efficiency and profit. There is no such thing as an actual cost and this is recognized by the accounting world. Provided therefore that estimating is backed by control checkpoints to ensure that the estimating function itself is sound, the other checks used by management will tend to be functional and directed to the broad areas of costs, rather than the costing in detail envisaged by many who are not familiar with the modern approach to control.

23. For certain highly complicated projects such as arise in the aircraft and electronics industries, there may be a large volume of work involved in estimating for a small quantity, perhaps only one unit of unique or in part unique design. When design forms part of the contract, the contractor may be required to quote before he has completed or even progressed far with the design of the product.

The contractor, therefore, has to accept a considerable degree of risk in submitting his quotation. However, Government investigators are not normally prepared to accept broad estimates or to commence the preparation of their estimates until such time as fully detailed drawings and specifications, including bills of material, part lists or assembly drawings, are available from which technical cost estimates can be prepared. There is a need for experienced estimators having the ability to prepare and verify estimates compiled by comparative means. Industry is required to quote commercially on this basis and it should be possible for Government officials to satisfy themselves whether the estimates are or are not fair and reasonable.

24. The point in time at which pricing action should be taken is a matter for arrangement between the Government and the contractor, but it should not be delayed to such a late stage in production that the contractor can no longer claim the risk rate of profit for risks which he has actually borne.

Overhead

25. Emphasis was placed in the Lang Report on the multiplying effect of the overhead rate on any errors in assessment of direct labour costs. With the exception of the proposal for a quantum of overhead expense appropriate to the Government contracts for a period, which is probably impracticable in all but a very few cases, the remedies suggested in the report present no innovations.

The report suggests that in the assessment of overhead account should be taken, inter alia, of the incidence of fixed and variable overhead charges. Except under comparatively stable conditions, however, this cannot be expected to provide an adequate answer. It has long been recognized that a number of expenses change with volume but do not follow a direct relationship to it. Overhead is affected by many factors some of which are not under the control of the contractor. In addition to changes in volume and manufacturers' techniques, and the extent to which production capacity is being utilized, or requires augmentation, factors such as product mix and Government fiscal policies, particularly in the long term can have a significant bearing on the cost and incidence of overhead. The budgeting or forecasting of overhead inevitably involves a detailed knowledge and understanding of the individual business in which they are being applied.

26. The principles of allocating overhead to cost centres are well established but their application may vary in individual businesses or in the case of individual products. The methods used for the absorption or recovery of overhead are generally more arbitrary and may therefore give rise to unsound application of overhead to individual products. It is right, therefore, that as proposed in the report, a proper study should be made of the bases for the recovery of overhead costs with a view to arriving at the most realistic product costs possible. It is doubtful, however, whether new techniques or major changes in existing techniques are required. The best techniques available should be applied.

27. Apart from the problem of improving methods of overhead recovery and providing differential rates, revision of official policy or better guidance in its application is called for in the following matters:

- (a) The amount to be allowed in overhead for the use of fixed assets, which at present ignores the cost of inflation.
- (b) Research, development and engineering costs, the allowance for which tends to be arbitrary.
- (c) The costs of general tooling and stock obsolescence.
- (d) Special costs which are essential to secure production volume and efficiency e.g. publicity; marketing; tendering, including tendering for exports.
- (e) The overhead costs applicable to work placed with subcontractors.
- (f) The costs of reorganization of the management structure, methods and facilities, and personnel, including the costs of management consultancy for the purpose of both short- and long-term developments.

Recommendations

28. There is no easy solution to the many problems associated with the pricing of Government contracts. However, there are certain basic principles in Government/industry relations which need to be recognized and accepted. It is in this context that the following recommendations are made.

- (1) The approach to pricing and control should be such as will encourage contractors to use, for the purpose of Government contracts, those management accounting and control techniques which are well established in private industry and which have proved to be more efficient and effective for control purposes than those based on historical job costing.
- (2) The emphasis should be on enabling the contractor to control both his Government and commercial operations efficiently, by sound budgetary control procedures, by standard costing and by cost control techniques based on good estimating and work study.
- (3) To this end the most urgent priority should be the establishment of fair and reasonable profit factors, accepted as such by industry and comparable with those obtainable for similar work and similar risks in the commercial field.

- (4) Such profit factors and methods of rewarding contractors should be arrived at by joint consultation between the Government, industry and the professional accounting bodies.
  - (5) Costs, capital employed, and the profit factors based on them, should take full account of past and future inflation.
  - (6) Proper guidance should be given by the establishment of principles governing the determination, inter alia, of the following:
    - (i) Direct costs and manufacturing contingencies.
    - (ii) Overhead which is allowable for Government contract purposes; its measurement and incidence.
    - (iii) Commercial, selling and distribution costs, general tooling, stock obsolescence, layouts and private venture research and development costs; the amounts properly to be included in costing rates established for Government costing purposes and the method of recoupment.
    - (iv) Capital employed and cost of production; the elements to be included and excluded, defining the method of measuring the elements relevant to Government work, and the accounting principles of implementation.
    - (v) Capital allowances, including those for scientific research purposes, and in development areas; their relevance for inclusion in costs and the impact on the return on capital employed.
- Such principles, together with instructions for their application should be made available to the accounting profession and Government contractors.

- (7) Every endeavour should be made to agree prices for Government contracts as early as possible, either before production commences or as soon as practicable thereafter, based upon technical estimates agreed between the parties.
- (8) In this context the question of whether a contractor is 'at risk' should be governed by the basis of the state of knowledge at the time of preparing such estimates, whether materials, labour or process times, or labour and overhead costing rates, rather than the ultimate date on which final prices are to be established.
- (9) The definition of equality should be widened to embrace a general disclosure of the rate of profitability achieved by the contractor on all work, or other Government work, coupled with satisfactory evidence as to the quality of his control and estimating procedures.
- (10) Contracts which require specifically, or by implication, the adoption of historical job costing should be avoided except where there is no alternative practicable method.
- (11) In general, whilst agreeing the need to safeguard the public purse by review of Government departmental efficiency, care should be taken that, in actions arising therefrom, the cure should not be worse than the ailment. Action should be such as will encourage both efficiency and enterprise in industry, and promote a situation where both Government and industry work together.

THE INSTITUTE OF COST AND WORKS ACCOUNTANTS*Conference at Buxton

A conference on various aspects of cost and management accountancy was held last week at Buxton, Derbyshire, by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants.

Following the opening of the conference by Mr W. L. Spalding, B.SC.(ECON.), C.A., F.C.W.A., F.C.I.S., President of the Institute, members were addressed by Mr R. G. Hooker, managing director of Associated Fire Alarms Ltd. Speaking on productivity Mr Hooker said that for the most part the initiative in wage negotiations had always been taken by the trade unions, and almost invariably these requests were refused initially by the employers, only to be conceded later.

Mr Hooker stated that these demands were bound to continue and it was certain that higher wages, shorter hours and longer holidays would have to be borne by industry. The employers' associations should recognize this fact, he said, and attempt to plan and forecast pay rises and approach the trade unions with proposals for better pay and conditions in return for the removal of restrictive practices and contributions towards higher productivity. They would thus seize the initiative and be able to bargain from a position of strength instead of, as in the past, always being on the defensive.

On Friday, addresses were given by Mr S. J. Careless, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., A.A.C.C.A., a member of the Council of the Institute, on 'The management accountant and current legislation', and Professor D. C. Hague, M.COM., Professor of Managerial Economics, University of Manchester, on 'The future of the management accountant'. Professor Hague expressed the belief that 'if we were all able to begin afresh in a perfect world we would want to establish a single body of accountants with two rather separate branches'. One would be mainly concerned with financial accounting, including taxation and auditing, and the other with accounting for management.

The final paper was given by Professor B. H. P. Rivett, M.Sc., Professor of Operational Research, University of Lancaster, on 'The management accountant and new techniques'. Professor Rivett dealt with the problem of assessing the consequences of decisions in complex situations and the manner in which different mathematical and statistical techniques could be deployed to study decision-making problems.

ASSOCIATION OF LECTURERS IN ACCOUNTANCY*Annual General Meeting

The first annual general meeting of the Association of Lecturers in Accountancy was held at Garnett College on June 18th. The chairman, Mr H. J. F. Harvey, F.A.C.C.A., A.M.B.I.M., A.T.I.I., in his report, spoke of the developing links with the professional bodies and the Department of Education and Science. Discussions were being arranged, he said, between the representatives of A.L.I.A. and the professional bodies on the vital matters now facing accountancy education referred to in the Association's policy statement issued earlier this year (see The Accountant, dated January 22nd). Decisions in the next year or two might well decide the pattern of accountancy education for the rest of this century.

During its first year the Association has been largely concerned with students' training courses because of the revolutionary changes taking place in that sphere; but it is also aware of the need to raise the standards of teaching in accountancy subjects generally and attention is to be devoted to this aspect. Successful conferences have been held and others have been planned as far as possible to take place in different parts of the country.

Professor W. T. Baxter, B.COM., C.A., of the University of London, in a stimulating address, referred to the far-reaching changes taking place in the practice of accountancy; particularly the switch of emphasis from historical accounting towards budgeting as an aid to decision making. The methods of measuring profit and presenting the balance sheet as a basis for reporting to shareholders required reconsideration. Professor Baxter indicated that much of the accountant's training in the past was inadequate to cater for modern techniques and formal education was necessary.

Fire can strike your business at any time, day or night. Fire that could destroy all vital documents, destroy your business. Do you know the best way to guard against it?

This is what happened to it:

- Subjected for 1 hour to a temperature rising to 1700°F.
- Dropped 30 feet on to a pile of broken bricks.
- Replaced upside down in the fire for a further half-hour (final temperature 1790°F).
- Cooled by powerful hose jets.

Management Information and Accounting

by R. WARWICK DOBSON, C.A., F.C.W.A.

A recommended book for the Certificate in Management Information, the examination for which is being held jointly by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland. Written for accountants from the point of view of managements' requirements not only for accounting information, but for information of all kinds. Dealing with many decisions both major and minor which managers of all businesses require to make, the book shows the place which accounting information – both financial and cost – occupies in the complete network of management information.

STOCKTAKING

Stocktaking, whether conducted by outside valuers or the firm's own staff, is of little value unless it is carefully synchronized with the books.

We have recruited a special stock-taking staff who have been vetted by a security consultant.

We should like to hear from any other Chartered Accountants who would like to consider a working arrangement whereby this specialist service was employed.

MANUAL OF AUDITING

THE FIRST
UNITED KINGDOM

In recent years the whole approach to auditing has changed. The old concepts of routine checking and vouching have gone and new standards are being set and new procedures evolved. This has become more than ever necessary by the increasing use of computers for which auditing techniques now have to be designed.

Taking as his starting-point the system of internal control installed by management, the auditor's task is to point out the weaknesses to his client and to make a tailor-made audit programme to fit the job in which tests of the day-to-day transactions are cut to a minimum. The auditor now observes, at regular intervals, the physical stock-taking carried out by his client's staff; if his report to shareholders is not to be qualified, he requires his client to maintain a higher standard of book-keeping and accounts than hitherto. His audit is carefully planned and is backed by a well defined system for the preparation, filing and presentation of working papers.

This book, which includes a comprehensive set of specimen forms and schedules, is the first of its kind in the United Kingdom which sets out these modern techniques and procedures in a readily understandable form. It is essentially practical and, except for a few changes necessary to make it suitable for publication, is based on the manual which has been developed over a long period of years, and is in daily use, by a firm of chartered accountants in practice.

Pitman announces!*The Principles of Auditing F. R. M. de Paula thirteenth edition by F. Clive de Paula

For many years de Paula's Principles of Auditing has been recognized as the standard work in its field. For this new edition many changes have been made in accordance with what is now regarded as the best audit practice. Such recent developments are covered without any alteration in the book's advanced and sophisticated approach. There is greater concentration on the balance sheet and on the physical checking of assets; the use of questionnaires for internal control is explained and demonstrated in detail; and, perhaps best of all, a valuable new chapter has been added on the audit of computer systems. This important work is officially recommended for Final C.I.S. and Intermediate and Final A.C.C.A. examinations and will be found useful by practitioners as well as students.

Capital Allowances to Lessors

IF a man hires out plant and machinery in return for a hire charge or rent, should he be taxed on the full rent without any allowance for the inevitable wear and tear, leading to ultimate scrapping, on the plant? The ordinary person, unversed in the subtle thought processes of the Inland Revenue, would at once deny that such an injustice would be allowed. The Inland Revenue, on the other hand, would say 'It all depends'. They argue stoutly that no allowance is due unless the plant is used in a trade. In this they are supported by the standard textbooks, but with doubtful authority.

The Revenue view appears in paragraph 24 of their 'Notes' on capital allowances for plant, last issued in 1963. Paragraph 24 of those Notes begins with this sentence (our italics):

'24. Where machinery or plant is leased to a trader and the whole burden of wear and tear falls on the lessor, the lessor may claim the capital allowances as though he had been carrying on a trade and as though the plant were used for the purposes of that trade.'

Where is the authority for the italicized words, and what difference can it make to the lessor whether the plant is being used in a trade, or for some other meritorious or unmeritorious purpose?

The authority for the allowance is section 298 of the Income Tax Act 1952. This section appears under a cross-heading 'Supplemental' in Chapter II of Part X of the Act. The earlier sections in Chapter II provide for initial, annual and balancing allowances on plant which is used in a trade. However, there is nothing in section 298 itself to suggest that the lessor's right to an allowance depends on whether the lessee decides to use the plant in a trade.

Section 298 reads:

'298. (1) Where machinery or plant is let upon such terms that the burden of the wear and tear thereof falls directly upon the lessor, there shall be made to him, for each year of assessment, an allowance on account of the wear and tear of so much of the machinery or plant as is in use at the end of the year:

'Provided that if the letting continues for part only of the year, the allowance, as computed in accordance with the preceding provisions of this Chapter, shall be proportionately reduced.

'(2) The preceding provisions of this Chapter shall apply in relation to any such lessor of machinery or plant as is mentioned in subsection (1) of this section as if the machinery or plant were, during the period of the letting, in use for the purposes of a trade carried on by him, and as if any reference to annual allowances included a reference to any allowance made under this section.'

Also included in the cross-heading 'Supplemental' in Chapter II is section 302; subsection (1) of which reads:

'302 (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the preceding provisions of this Chapter shall, with necessary adaptations, apply in relation to:

(a) professions, employments, vocations and offices; and

(b) the occupation of woodlands where the profits or gains thereof are assessable under Schedule D, as they apply in relation to trades'.

One would have expected paragraph 24 of the published Notes to have mentioned section 302, instead of making the bald statement that the lease has to be to a trader. In the absence of such a reference, the reader must get such comfort as he can from paragraph 2 which says that the Notes in the main refer to trades and traders, 'but what is said applies generally to members of professions and, with some modifications, to employees and others who may claim allowances'.

The Revenue view of section 298 has now been challenged in Macsaga Investment Co Ltd v. Lupton. The company owned a long lease of a new office block which it underlet to the Minister of Works for a period of thirty-five years from June 1958 on an ordinary repairing lease. It was common ground that neither lessor nor lessee carried on any trade. Nevertheless, the company claimed capital allowances under section 298 (1) on certain heating equipment, lifts, sprinklers, incinerator and fittings in the building. The Revenue resisted the claim on two grounds, viz., the one we mention above, and also the ground that, under the terms of the lease, the burden of the wear and tear did not fall on the lessor.

The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the Revenue on the first ground, and indicated that they would have been against the Revenue on the second ground. After mentioning the cross-heading 'Supplemental' the Special Commissioners went on to say:

'It appears to us that the scheme of Chapter II (with the exception of the matters referred to in section 302) is to provide allowances in respect of machinery or plant in use in a trade, and that this is the basis of all [sic] the other sections in the Chapter. We think it highly improbable that section 298 provides an allowance in respect of assets which are not in use in any trade at all, and we hold that the items in dispute are not machinery or plant within the meaning of section 298 (1).'

The company then appealed to the High Court which dismissed the appeal for a different reason, namely, that the burden of wear and tear did not fall directly on the lessor. It seems fair to assume, therefore, that Mr Justice PENNYCUICK has rejected the Revenue's interpretation of section 298. However, it is perhaps a little early to rejoice. Having held that the burden of wear and tear did not fall on the company, it was not necessary for him to decide whether or not the plant had to be used in a trade. It is therefore still open to the Revenue to take the point.

There are certainly arguments in favour of the Revenue's view, particularly in the light of the history of section 298. It first saw the light of day as part of section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1878. Section 12 gave wear and tear allowances on plant used for the purposes of a trade and went on to give a like allowance to the lessor of plant, although without actually saying what the plant had to be used for. When that section was consolidated in 1918, it appeared in Rule 6 of the Rules of Cases I and II of Schedule D. Again, however, there was no specific requirement that the lessee should be a trader, and ex hypothesi, the lessor would not necessarily be taxed under Case I or Case II on the rent.

On the whole we think that on a proper construction of section 298 the Revenue view is wrong. However that may be, there seems to be little merit in maintaining this view, bearing in mind the extension of capital allowances made by section 302 of the 1952 Act, and section 72 of the Finance Act 1960. Once the Legislature has given its blessing to capital allowances for plant used in employments, in maintaining premises and in managing premises, it seems pointless to hold out for one small sector where capital allowances are still not given. Moreover, this rearguard action hardly seems to be consistent with the practice of granting the allowances to companies who hire out television sets to the public. If it were purely a question of merit, there can hardly be much doubt that most people's sympathies would lie with the lessor of lifts and central heating apparatus, rather than the lessor of television sets. One of the reasons why investment allowances were largely withdrawn was the fact that these were being given on television sets hired out to the public. If the Revenue are right about section 298, it is arguable that these allowances need never have been given.

Progress Report on Giro

IN a leading article in our issue of August 28th last, we commented on the White Paper outlining the Government's plans for a Post Office giro system and the press conference on its publication. Now, a little under a year later, Mr JOHN GRADY, the Director of the giro, has given a progress report and published a booklet describing, in particular for the benefit of 'business firms, public utilities, local authorities and other organizations', the operation of the scheme as it is now taking shape. A mass distribution of the booklet to such organizations (50,000 copies a week) is now under way; it is to be made available to the general public at a later stage.

It can be said at once that the booklet is in itself a good omen for the giro to come. It is handsomely – some will say extravagantly – produced; it is clearly and directly written. It describes in sufficient detail the what, the how – and the how much – of the giro, covering little more ground than last year's White Paper, but putting some interesting flesh on the White Paper's bones. Naturally enough, it points to the giro's advantages, but it does so in a decently restrained tone of voice. And it says that 'a big advertising campaign is planned to present giro to the general public'. The recruiting advertisements of which Kitty was the heroine have shown us in recent months how 'with it' the Post Office is prepared to be in its publicity, and this first promotional essay of the giro suggests that the campaign to come will be well done.

Charges are to be as foreshadowed in the White Paper: nothing for transfers within the system, 9d for payments in by non-account holders, 9d for open payment orders up to £50 ('the payment order resembles a cheque'), 9d for all crossed payment orders, 2s for open payment orders over £50, 6d for transfers from giro to bank accounts. 'Forms and envelopes will be supplied at cost plus a small addition to contribute towards the amount which the Post Office will have to pay to the Exchequer in lieu of stamp duty. The total charge will not be more than 7s 6d per fifty forms. Companies printing their own forms by arrangement with giro will have to pay a compounded amount in lieu of stamp duty.' There is an example of a month's working on a 'typical private giro account', with four weeks' pay credited, three standing orders paid, ten bills settled and four cash withdrawals, at a total cost to the account holder of 5s. The heading, 'Low cost to the account holder', is fair comment, for there is no postage involved; but the ten bills must all be paid to giro account holders – there will be another 9d as well as postage for each bill paid to a non-account holder.

It is, of course, essential for the success of the giro that large-scale creditors should have giro accounts; that is the point of the booklet. Certainly the giro is preparing itself to offer them good service, including integration of their book-keeping with that of the giro. A useful development of the scheme is the 'automatic debit transfer'; businesses that 'collect varying amounts at intervals from large numbers of customers' can obtain the agreement of such of those customers as have giro accounts to be debited direct at agreed dates, the creditors sending out their bills and, after the agreed time lapse, initiating giro debits – the debtors taking no action at all unless they wish to question the bills. Creditors will not have to show the giro evidence of their debtors' agreement, but must indemnify the giro against debtors' claims for irregular debiting.

But for large-scale creditors and for everyone else in the community, perhaps the booklet's most important point is the statement that 'a company will be able readily to transfer money from its giro account to its own or someone else's joint-stock bank account'. (It may reasonably be assumed that a private customer will be able to do the same.) And after an explanation of how this will be done the booklet continues 'it is understood that the joint-stock banks will provide complementary facilities'. It looks as though we are to have the kind of integration which we suggested here last August would give Britain the most efficient money-transmission service in the world.

There are still questions hanging over the giro. Few observers share the official optimism as to its profitability. Some are doubtful whether its obvious benefits will not be outweighed in the long run by the damage it may do to the clearing banks, not least in its possible sapping of their lending resources. And underlying all the other questions is the basic one: will the giro be as popular as its advocates have always promised? The test of it all is not to be long delayed; it is hoped to launch the giro in the autumn of 1968, in the vast building at Bootle where they are prepared to process a million entries a day, in a twenty-four hour clearing service. As far as one can judge on the evidence of Mr GRADY's testimony and the prospectus of the booklet, if the giro fails it will not be for the lack of a lively, forward-looking approach to a formidable enterprise.

Royal Luncheon Party

SIR HENRY BENSON, C.B.E., F.C.A., President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, was a guest at an informal luncheon party given by the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh at Buckingham Palace on Tuesday. The other guests were: Chief Superintendent Shirley Beck, Metropolitan Police; Miss Sheila Scott; The Lord Campbell, President, West India Committee; Judge Carl Aarvolc, Recorder of London; Dr Stanley Browne, Director, The Leprosy Study Centre, London; Mr C. E. Waldron, General Manager, London Airport; Professor Gordon Black, Director, National Computing Centre, Manchester; Professor Ernst Chain, Professor of Biochemistry, University of London.

Fiscal Legislation

THE exchange of letters between Mr John Diamond, F.C.A., Chief Secretary to the Treasury, and the President of the English Institute, referred to in the report of the Council meeting and reproduced on other pages in this issue, is a sequel to the correspondence between the President and the Chancellor of the Exchequer published and commented upon in The Accountant of May 14th and 21st. Mr Diamond, of course, has a point when he argues that the amount of pre-Budget discussion that can take place outside what we may call the 'inner-circle' of the Chancellor and his advisers is, of necessity, limited.

It should not be impossible, however, subject to constitutional amendments, to lengthen the interval between the Budget address and the publication of the Finance Bill. Alternatively – since effective criticism of fiscal proposals is really practicable only on the basis of the Finance Bill – could not an independent committee of interested M.P.s and members of the accountancy profession be created to vet the Finance Bill before it goes to the House of Commons for debate?

The present situation in which weary M.P.s are briefed on complex points for all-night sittings at the Committee stage, really is a most inefficient method of ensuring that tax legislation is both equitable and workable.

The setting up of a joint standing consultative committee with the profession was also raised by the Editor of the Certified Accountants Journal in an interview granted him by Mr Callaghan and reported in the current issue of the Journal. The Chancellor's reply was equally discouraging and final.

The Government's attitude is obviously summed up in the opening phrase of the final paragraph of the Chief Secretary's letter – 'So far as the Government are concerned, it seems to us that the present informal arrangements work satisfactorily.' So far as the accountancy profession is concerned, however, the reverse is the case. Before the Government's numerous economic advisers produce still more fiscal rabbits from their commodious hats, could not a few accountants be enlisted to review the proposals from the minor viewpoint of making them work?

Estate Duty: What is a Purchase?

PROPERTY which passes on a death 'by reason only of a bona fide purchase from the person under whose disposition the property passes' is exempt from estate duty (Finance Act 1894, section 3 (1)). The term 'purchase' has now been held to include an arrangement under which Lady Harmsworth accepted a £5,000 annuity under her husband's will on terms that she would hold her own estate on trust for herself for her life, and then on the same trusts for her issue as were contained in her husband's will.

Sir Leicester Harmsworth, the husband, died on January 19th, 1937, making the bequest to Lady Harmsworth of the £5,000 annuity. Within the stipulated three months she accepted it on the stipulated terms. She died in 1963 leaving a will which carried out those terms. The Estate Duty Office argued that there could be no purchase without a consensus of minds; what Lady Harmsworth had done was to execute a unilateral intention. The word 'agree' in the will of Sir Leicester did not connote any mutual arrangement. However, Mr Justice Buckley held that all the common law elements of a sale and purchase were present, and accordingly the exemption applied. He ordered the Estate Duty Office to refund £106,500 duty plus interest thereon. Leave was given to appeal.

Sir Harold Gillett retires from the Council of the Institute

SIR HAROLD GILLETT, Bt, M.C., F.C.A., has retired from the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, of which he has been a member since 1949. The announcement of his retirement was received with regret by the Council at its meeting on July 6th, reported elsewhere in this issue.

Sir Harold, who is senior partner in Dixon, Wilson, Tubbs & Gillett, Chartered Accountants, of London, was admitted to membership of the Institute in 1914. As a member of the Council for seventeen years he served on most of its committees, including the Examination, General Purposes, Disciplinary and Finance, having been chairman of the last two. He is a Past President of The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London, serving from 1952 to 1958 despite the responsibilities of his civic duties during that period as Alderman and, in 1952-53, sheriff of the City of London. In 1958, he was elected Lord Mayor of London and in an active year, in which he attended over eighty more functions than any previous Lord Mayor, ably upheld the traditions of that high office.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

MEASUREMENT of profit is always a cause of boardroom friction. To compare what we made in 1965 with what we made in 1964 or with what we forecast at the turn of the year is simple enough, but it's also a negative and fruitless exercise.

At our recent annual general meeting a disgruntled shareholder, who unfortunately for him had bulled when he should have beared, and vice versa, with our ordinary shares, castigated the board. It would have paid him better to have invested his few thousand pounds of savings in 'gilts', he grumbled, and to have had peace of mind, rather than to entrust his fortune to a group of moribund morons who couldn't earn enough profit to keep their shareholders out of the poorhouse.

He said a lot more, too, in spite of our deputy-chairman telling him strenuously he was out of order, and numerous partisans joining in vociferously before they were overborne by weight of votes.

However, the managing director, somewhat disconcerted by the rumblings of revolt, convened a special board meeting the following day to discuss rates of profit. The company's accountant, he said suavely, might perhaps explain the latest high level economic thinking. As is usual with tycoons under stress of criticism, his opening gambit was to asperse by innuendo his expert advisers.

It was a time for some knitted brows plus a spot of finger-tapping with an implication of as much rebuke as I dared, garnished with weighty pauses. Just because gross profits at 19 per cent of net turnover were up by a half of 1 per cent on last year; just because overall costs had broken even, I indicated, there was no cause for complacency. A baleful twitching of the managing director's nostrils warned that he preferred to retain the more pompous platitudes for his own use, so I hastened on to the facts.

Surely the key to the problem lay in the return on capital invested, as compared with contemporary loan interest rates and investment yields. Was our outspoken shareholder justified in his comment? . . . of course he wasn't, naturally (a correction triggered off by a snort from the deputy chairman) . . . but how did the figures compare? I had some informative charts for scrutiny. . . .

Ten years' net profits revealed an informative trend. They were graphed as shown in the accounts, before tax deductions, alongside another line adjusted for special items. Non-recurrent losses like factory stocks written off as obsolete, and demolition of the corner block, and overdraft interest excluded temporarily . . . heads were nodded sagely. Yes, very creditable figures, very satisfactory; the board, they intimated, surely deserved their own congratulations.

The next graph showed capital invested, i.e. what the balance sheets revealed each year-end, at cost, but of course the values carried forward at the opening date needed explanations.

Profits made in 1955 obviously equated with items capitalized in 1955, pound for pound, but what about values for buildings bought seventy years ago? What about the Victorian pound sterling? Escalation on an estimated scale had been used to provide a basis for discussion, but . . . then came the interruptions. The M.D. cut in shrewdly to distinguish between capital invested and capital employed. The D.C. queried assets written off and eliminated from the balance sheet. Prinny questioned the role of the depreciation reserve (he's never really understood it, we gathered), and I wanted an up-to-date valuation for replacement of assets.

We tailed off in some confusion, so the M.D. resolved his problem by asking me to furnish a detailed résumé of the arguments by the end of the month. My problem is finding the answers.

ing to the amount of capital employed, the largest is Shell Transport with £1,375 million and a turnover of £1,472 million. Imperial Chemical Industries comes second with capital employed totalling £1,059 million and a turnover of £816 million.

The picture is slightly different when the companies are ranked by reference to the percentage increase in profits; this year British American Tobacco heads that list with Shell coming second; while a private company, Pilkington Brothers, is among the leaders. In contrast, last year's 'winner' - I.C.I. - is now well down the list and has, in fact, sustained the largest absolute fall in profits. Other companies to sustain profit falls are I.C.T., Unilever and Hoover.

Classifying the companies on the basis of their return on capital finds the Beecham Group out in front - a company which ranks 135th in order of size. Among other companies whose return on capital is high are A.T.V., Showerings and Butlins. At the other end of the same scale are two famous names in shipping, Ellerman's and Cunard, with P. & O. only slightly above them.

The Review comments that the companies with the lowest return on capital tend to be among the larger companies, whereas those at the top of this classification are those in the latter half of the '300' classified by size. There may be a moral in this for investors already bemused by thoughts of higgledy-piggledy growth!

Pension Schemes for Small Companies

By AN INSURANCE CORRESPONDENT

THERE seems little possibility at the moment of the State pension being increased to such a level that it will be unnecessary for supplementary occupational pension arrangements to be provided, either wholly or in part, by employers.

Whether a pension is termed a 'fringe benefit', or is looked at more realistically as deferred pay, it is increasingly clear that this is something which employers should provide. Probably it is true to say that most really large employers already have pension schemes of one kind or another - although in a great many cases these apply to staff and not to works employees. Many smaller companies, however, have put off the decision to institute a scheme.

Probably one of the reasons for deferring making a firm decision to have a scheme has been uncertainty about the future. Almost certainly, too, the question of cost has played an important part. A point, however, which is not always appreciated is that when an employee, who has given long service, retires, some form of provision will have to be made for his retirement. Ad hoc arrangements of this kind can prove to be very expensive indeed, and problems may well arise within a small company if a number of these employees reach retiring age in the same year. It is much more practical to have a properly funded scheme.

If, however, it is decided that only one or two key employees are to be provided with pensions, probably the best arrangement is for them to be given an individual pension policy - which is very much like the 'top hat' pension policy which so often is provided for senior executives in companies in addition to a basic pension scheme.

With this kind of arrangement, all the premiums are paid by the employer (and rank as a trading expense in the normal way). Should an employee wish to increase the pension which will be available, by making a contribution himself, so as to obtain full relief of tax on the contributions (rather than for this to be limited to two-fifths), the employee should agree to sacrifice part of his salary or wages so that this can be paid direct as premium by the company. Usually this kind of pension arrangement provides a death benefit should the employee die while in service before retirement. The capital sum should not be greater than the equivalent of about ten times the maximum approvable pension. Since this cash benefit will not be paid to the employee's dependants as a right, but will be paid initially to the company, it should not attract estate duty.

Graduated scheme

Whereas an employee for whom this individual arrangement is made may be contracted out of the State graduated pension scheme - while the others remain in it - generally speaking, if an occupational pension arrangement is made for a small firm (say, with up to twenty-five employees), it is unlikely to be economic to contract them out of it. Only if all the employees are earning in excess of £1,000 per annum, which, of course, is most unlikely, will there be a marginal saving in cost. Even so, the company should bear in mind that the additional administrative expenses would probably absorb this amount, and more.

Usually, in the case of a comparatively small company, a pension scheme should be arranged with an insurance company. Although there is much to be said in favour of a self-administered pension fund, it should be borne in mind that this is likely to prove economic only where large numbers of employees are involved. For instance, it has been estimated that, as a guide, a self-administered fund should be considered only when the annual contributions are in excess of £10,000. Even so, the trustees may need to go to the insurance market for certain kinds of cover to save the fund being upset in different ways.

Shared cost

A point to be considered at the outset when the whole question of a pension scheme is being discussed is whether the whole cost should be met by the employer, or whether contributions should be made by employees. No hard and fast rule can be made about this. Since a company is competing with others, probably there is much to be said for adopting the same line as is being taken by other comparable companies.

What, however, should be borne in mind is that it is unlikely that it will prove possible, for economic reasons, to provide a really generous level of benefits from a non-contributory scheme. Thus, if this is chosen, the benefits may be at a relatively low level.

Generally speaking, there is much to be said in favour of a contributory scheme. In this way, a reasonable level of benefit can be achieved, and there is no reason at all why employees should not contribute to their pensions in this way. A further argument in favour of a contributory scheme is that, as an employee makes his contributions, he builds up a part of the pension which is his very own. Thus, whatever may happen in the future (if, for instance, he should leave the employment for one reason or another), he will still be able to take part of his pension with him.

Gone are the days of looking at a pension scheme as a form of 'fringe benefit' which puts employees in a position where they do not feel they can afford to leave. It is much better that a pension scheme should give an employee what he really needs. Then it, together with the employment, can be judged strictly on its own merits.

Initial problems

When a pension scheme is first arranged, it is usual for an insurance company to make it compulsory for every permanent employee over a certain age (who has completed a specified qualifying period of service) to join the scheme. Frankly, this can lead to problems. In the first place, there are always some employees who do not want to join because of the contributions which they will have to make. They seem to fail to appreciate that, if they join, the company probably will be paying more towards their pension than they themselves.

Secondly, there may be some opposition even when a scheme is arranged on a non-contributory basis. They feel that there is a catch to it in one way or another. The stock solution to the problems created by employees who adopt these attitudes is for the employer to make it clear that any employees who are not prepared to join the scheme will be classified as 'temporary'.

What level of pension should be provided? In the first place, a company is quite entitled to take into account the State pension which will be received by employees, provided it is borne in mind that it is at little more than subsistence level. Nor is the graduated scheme likely to have a significant effect on a man's total pension.

When a final total figure has been decided upon as an adequate pension, say between £200 and £300 per annum may be deducted, so as to take account of the State pension.

Normally it is usual for a fairly small company to have a scheme whereby a certain level of earnings in a particular year earns a set amount towards the pension at retirement. By this means, the ultimate pension takes into account both the length of service and the earnings of the employees. Certainly this need not be expensive for an employer. For instance, with young employees, the total cost of a reasonable scheme may not amount to more than, say, 8 per cent of the payroll. With a contributory scheme, the employer may pay, say, half this amount.

This should not be considered unreasonable. Nevertheless, this kind of arrangement does have one drawback. If inflation continues at its present rate, although a certain level of pension may seem quite adequate at the moment, the chances are that it may be too low for reasonable comfort by the time the employee retires. To some extent, this kind of arrangement is based on average earnings throughout the service of an employee, and the chances are that, due to inflation, the cost of living (and, hence, earnings) will rise substantially before an employee retires. If, therefore, a scheme is arranged on these lines, its limitations should be recognized at the outset. Although it may be comparatively inexpensive initially, it will be necessary for it to be reviewed from time to time so that improvements can be made for employees; these improvements, incidentally, could prove to be quite expensive.

So as to keep the cost as low as possible, some insurance offices have produced contracts which simply provide a lump sum for an employee on his retirement. If, however, this is the sole arrangement, it is unsatisfactory – for the simple reason that the pension which can be secured by the purchase of an immediate annuity is quite low.

There is no doubt that one of the best ways to combat inflation during the period before an employee retires is for the benefits of a pension scheme to be linked in some way to an employee's final earnings, although, clearly, this will not be cheap. As a guide, if one is considering a company with young employees, a generous salary scheme might be arranged for about 15 per cent of the payroll. This, however, should be taken as nothing more than a guide – for nobody can tell in advance how much the cost may be. Incidentally, where a contributory scheme is arranged, it is usual for employees to pay at a fixed rate, and for the balance to be met by the employer.

Past service

Is it right that, when a pension scheme is instituted, the man who is due to retire in a few years' time will receive a negligible pension? Employers feel that such employees should not be treated harshly. Usually, therefore, arrangements are made for past service to qualify for benefit accruing from the employer's contributions. Clearly, the amount required for these past service contributions can be considerable; as a result, when a scheme is first instituted, rather than for these contributions to be paid initially in a lump sum, usually it is possible to spread them over a number of years.

If, despite these arrangements, the past-service contributions would be too high for an employer, a compromise is for past service to earn, say, a half or a quarter of the pension applicable after the introduction of the scheme.

Some employees feel that they would like to remedy the position by paying a lump sum from their savings into the scheme – in lieu of past contributions. Unfortunately, however, this is not possible.

Mention has been made of inflation and how a 'final salary' scheme can overcome this difficulty during employment. The fact must be faced, however, that inflation will continue while an employee is in retirement, with the result that a fixed pension will have progressively less value in terms of purchasing power.

At the moment, comparatively few occupational pension schemes make provision for a pension to increase, as of right, while it is being paid. Nevertheless, there are ways in which pensions can be increased after retirement. The position at the moment is that, when surpluses are thrown up when funds are valued, although they can be used to reduce a company's contributions towards pensions in the future, in practice the great majority of employers are using these surpluses to increase the pensions of existing employees and of pensioners.

So far as pensioners are concerned, usually an increase is made on a flat percentage basis – although it may vary according to the period during which employees have been retired.

Since an increase of this kind is made solely at the discretion of the employer, pensioners have no right to it before the decision is taken. Nevertheless, once such an increase has been made, it cannot be withdrawn, and, of course, further increases may be made in the future.

A practical problem from the point of view of the pensioners is that they do not know if and when an increase will be made, or how much it will be. Everything revolves round there being a surplus available, and the employer agreeing to use it in this way.

To avoid this uncertainty, an increasing number of employers are seeing the advantage of arranging a pension which has a built-in increase after retirement. Admittedly, it is impossible to tell what increase will be needed, but probably it is better to have an increase which is on the low side rather than no increase at all.

As a guide, one could have a built-in increase of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent per annum (although this may take effect only, say, every three years). To incorporate an increase of this nature is likely to raise the cost of providing the pension by about 15 per cent. Admittedly, sometimes a lower figure is quoted, but usually it will be found that, in addition, certain assumed bonuses are taken into account. Although it is true that this kind of pension is unlikely to appeal to an employee so much as a level pension which is 15 per cent higher than the initial level of this pension, there is no doubt that it can save employers worrying too much about pensioners once they have left their employment.

Provision for widow

Besides the increase in the cost of living after retirement, a point which must be faced is that, probably, a pensioner will die before his wife. What is the position of the wife? Usually a pension is guaranteed for five years. The chances are, however, that a wife will live for longer than five years after her husband's retirement.

Basically, this is a problem for the pensioner himself to solve, but one way of helping him, at no cost to the company, is for it to be made a rule that shortly before retirement every employee is given the option of taking a reduced pension which will continue for the lifetime of his wife should he predecease her. Sometimes such a pension is level for the whole period, or it may drop when the pensioner himself dies.

Although not strictly a pension question, it is usual for a life assurance scheme to be arranged in conjunction with a pension arrangement. The aim is to provide a capital payment (in addition to the repayment of the pension contributions) should an employee die in service and thus not reach retirement.

Fortunately, this kind of scheme is relatively cheap, since there is not bound to be a claim. The usual method is for the benefit to be payable to the employee's legal personal representative. Nevertheless, if it is likely that estate duty would be payable, it is better for a discretionary trust to be formed. By this means, the trustees decide to whom the benefit shall be paid. Thus, provided the sum is considered to be reasonable, it should not be subject to estate duty.

It should be stressed that there is no need for an employer to be too ambitious about pension arrangements at the outset. It is much better to have a modest scheme rather than no scheme at all. Improvements can always be made later. In fact, any scheme should be kept under constant review, so that improvements can be made as and when they are possible.

Capital Gains Tax: Deceased Estates and Settled Property – II

PART II – SETTLED PROPERTY

THE main charging section for settled property is section 25. For the purpose of this part of the Act the term 'settled property' has a restricted meaning defined in section 45. The definition is as follows:

'"settled property" means, subject to subsection (8) below, any property held in trust other than property to which section 22 (5) of this Act applies'.

The reference to subsection (8) of section 45 excludes unit trusts from the operation of section 25. The reference to section 22 (5) is to situations where assets are held by a nominee or by a trustee for someone who is absolutely entitled – or who would be but for the fact that he is an infant or suffers some other similar disability. Subsection 22 (5) also covers the situation where property is held by trustees for joint tenants and tenants in common.

Trustees

Section 25 (1) provides that, as in the case of personal representatives, the trustees shall be treated as a single and continuing body of persons (distinct from the persons who may from time to time be trustees). The subsection further provides that the body of trustees shall be treated as being resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom unless:

- (a) the general administration of the trusts is ordinarily carried on outside the United Kingdom;
- and
- (b) the trustees, or a majority of them for the time being are not resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

Before considering the implications of the section so far, it is appropriate to consider the lengthy proviso to this subsection.

It provides that,

'a person carrying on a business which consists of or includes the management of trusts, and acting as trustees of a trust in the course of that business, shall be treated in relation to that trust as not resident in the United Kingdom, if the whole of the settled property consists of or derives from property provided by a person not at the time (or, in the case of a trust arising under a testamentary disposition or on an intestacy or partial intestacy, at his death) domiciled, resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom'.

It is interesting to note that there are two small differences between this proviso and the proviso in a similar section, section 13 of the Finance Act 1962, the Act which first charged short-term capital gains. Whereas in the 1965 Act it is provided that 'a person carrying on a business . . .', in the 1962 Act it is provided that 'a body corporate carrying on a business . . .', shall have the benefit of the section. Subsequently, the 1965 Act says 'acting as trustees', while the 1962 Act has 'trustee' in the singular. I am given to understand that this extension is for the benefit of those who undertake the work of managing trusts and is to enable the effect of the proviso to be enjoyed by solicitors and accountants who undertake such work.

Returning now to the earlier part of subsection (1), if the trustees or a majority of them are non-resident or not ordinarily resident the trust will be held to be non-resident and accordingly will not be chargeable to capital gains tax. Thus, if, for instance, a trust has three trustees, one in the United Kingdom, one in Spain and one in Italy and the trust is administered from Italy, the trust will be non-resident. If, however, either the Italian or the Spanish resident trustee become resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, the residence of the trust will move to the United Kingdom since a majority of the trustees will then be resident or ordinarily resident here.

The significant words of the proviso are:

'a person not at the time domiciled, resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom'.

Thus, where a settlor who satisfies these conditions chooses trustees resident in the United Kingdom, it is the status of the settlor which determines that the trust shall not be chargeable to capital gains tax, not the residence or ordinary residence of the trustees.

A further point arises with the phrase 'not at the time'. It appears that if a person not domiciled in the United Kingdom nor resident therein settles property on United Kingdom trustees and later takes up residence here, the trust would not be treated as a United Kingdom resident trust.

Bare trustees

Before further considering section 25, I think I should mention the position of those who are nominees or trustees for persons who are absolutely entitled. Trustees having this status enjoy the description of 'bare trustees'. Their position is such that all their dealings with assets are treated as though they were dealings by the beneficial owners or those absolutely entitled. In these circumstances any transfer of the apparent ownership of assets to the beneficial owner or the person absolutely entitled is ignored for the purpose of the capital gains tax, except, as will be considered later, that there will be a deemed disposal when the beneficiary first becomes absolutely entitled. In the case of bare trustees the alternative basis of assessment to capital gains tax will be available. Section 250 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952 gives the Revenue the right by notice in writing to require any person in whose name shares are registered to state whether he is or he is not the beneficial owner of those shares, and if he is not, to provide them with the names and addresses of those persons who are the beneficial owners.

Settlements

Subsection (2) provides that a gift in settlement, either revocable or irrevocable, is a disposal of the property becoming settled, whether or not the donor has a beneficial interest under the settlement. Thus, where assets are settled, the settlor will be liable to pay capital gains tax on any increase in value accruing between April 6th, 1965, or the date on which the asset was acquired, whichever is the later, and the value on the date of the execution of the settlement. Unlike estate duty, there is no exemption for settlements on marriage.

As and when the trustees dispose of assets, any gains arising from the disposals will be assessable on the trustees who will have to account for the capital gains tax at the rate of 30 per cent. If there are losses these will be set against any current gains, and any excess being unrelieved losses will be carried forward to be set against future gains.

Depending on the type of trust, there will be a vesting day when property vests in named beneficiaries. On the occasion of this vesting, all the assets forming the corpus of the trust are deemed to be disposed of by the trustee and immediately re-acquired by him as trustee within section 22 (5) – as a bare trustee – for a consideration equal to their market value, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (3). This deemed disposal takes place even though the assets remain in the hands of the trustees, albeit temporarily. When at some future time the assets are transferred to the beneficiary no liability for capital gains tax will ensue, unless the trustee has failed to pay the tax referable to the deemed disposal. From the date that the beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled, any gains made on the disposal of assets will be eligible for the alternative basis of assessment under section 21 (1).

It is appropriate here to consider the meaning of the words 'absolutely entitled to any settled property as against the trustee', which is undefined in the Act. A reasonable interpretation may be taken as 'being entitled to require the trustee to transfer to the beneficiary the settled property subject to deductions of any sums for costs and expenses and all forms of taxation, such sums being lawfully chargeable against the property of a settlement'. The effect of this is that there will be two charges to capital gains tax on becoming absolutely entitled. The first charge will be on the deemed disposal (in the case of a life-tenant, on his death when the tax will be deducted in computing the amount of any estate duty payable). The second charge will arise when the trustee sells assets (if this is necessary) to meet the capital gains tax (and any estate duty that is payable by reason of the deemed disposal on the death of the life-tenant). In the latter case the trustee will be acting as a 'bare trustee' for the person absolutely entitled, and the provisions relating to gains by an individual will apply.

Losses

Section 25 (8) provides that if on the occasion of anyone becoming absolutely entitled to any settled property as against the trustee, any allowable loss which has accrued to the trustee in respect of the property, either in the year of assessment when the beneficiary has become absolutely entitled, or in any earlier year, shall, if it cannot be set off against gains by the trustee in that year be treated as if it were an allowable loss accruing to the person becoming entitled instead of the trustee. Put more briefly, the beneficiary acquires any unrelieved losses of his trustee. Thus a beneficiary can set past losses of the trustee against present and future gains.

Life interests

We now come to deal with the question of life interests. Subsection (10) of section 25 defines 'life interest' for the purposes of the section as follows:

- '(a) includes a right under the settlement to the income of, or the use or occupation of, settled property for the life of another, or for any period which will or may terminate before all the settled property becomes property to which some person is absolutely entitled as against the trustee;
- (b) does not include any right which is contingent on the exercise of the discretion of the trustee or the discretion of some other person; and
- (c) does not include an annuity, notwithstanding that the annuity is payable out of or charged on settled property or the income of settled property.'

It seems then that 'life interest' includes an interest pur autre vie and also a term of years (from the use of the words any other period').

Section 25 (4) provides that where there is a termination of a life interest in possession after April 6th, 1965, the assets forming the settled property, except those which cease to be settled on a beneficiary becoming absolutely entitled, shall be deemed to be disposed of and immediately re-acquired by the trustee at their market value, any gains or losses being calculated in accordance with the provisions of Schedule 6. Where there is a life interest in only part of the settled property, and that interest is a life interest in income with no recourse to any other part of the settled property, subsection (12) provides that the part in which the life interest subsists shall be treated as a separate settlement of settled property. This will not apply to a joint interest in a part of a settled fund, when disposal will be deemed to take place on the death of the first of the joint beneficiaries.

The effect of subsection (4) is that even though a life interest, which is one of several consecutive life interests in the settlement, has terminated, the whole of the settled fund is deemed to be disposed of. The likely penal effect of this situation in circumstances where several life interests terminate shortly after each other was recognized in the inclusion under subsection (6) of the 'fifteen-year rule'.

Subsection (6) provides that if subsection (4) applies and there is a deemed disposal on the termination of a life interest, then the application of subsection (4), i.e. the deemed disposal, shall not take effect within fifteen years of the previous occasion when subsection (4) took effect.

If, however, there is no other termination of a life interest in possession within the fifteen-year term there will still be a deemed disposal fifteen years after the previous deemed disposal and so on successively every fifteen years until there arises a liability under subsection (3) when a person becomes absolutely entitled as against the trustee.

Advances

Subsection (4) has been the subject of much controversy both in the House of Commons and outside. The problem which as yet is not satisfactorily resolved, despite the statement by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, is the question of the deemed disposal of the whole of a settled fund when a small advancement is made to a beneficiary. In practice the Inland Revenue will not regard section 25 (4) as being brought into operation by a modest advance which is made for the purpose of defraying educational expenditure for the benefit of a beneficiary. The Inland Revenue have indicated that they will be prepared to state, before a prospective advance is made, whether it will in their view satisfy these conditions. Applications in this respect should be made to The Secretary ('Taxes'), Inland Revenue, at Somerset House, giving the name of the trust, together with details of the appropriate tax district, the amount or value of the prospective advance and the purpose for which it is to be made. While it is to be hoped that the situation will soon be clarified, the worst possible construction of the present wording of the subsection does present an opportunity for postponing the payment of taxation on future deemed disposals. It would appear that if, as soon as a small gain exists on the value of a settled fund, an advancement is made, then though capital gains tax will be paid on the small gain, there can be no possibility of another deemed disposal for a further fifteen years unless before the expiry of the fifteen years an individual becomes absolutely entitled as against the trustee.

Death relief

Subsection (5) provides that where on the death of an individual the £5,000 relief under section 24 (2) has not been used or fully used, the relief for the unused part is available against the aggregate gains accruing to the trustees under subsections (3) and (4). Where, however, the relief under subsection (4) is postponed to the end of the fifteen-year period because of subsection (6) any unused part of the £5,000 relief may be used on the next occasion when subsection (4) operates. In cases where there is more than one body of trustees, the amount available for relief is to be apportioned between the bodies of trustees according to the respective value of settled property deemed to be disposed of by the trustees. Any relief available is also subject to any relief previously given on retirement under section 34.

Example 11

A died January 1st, 1970, being a life-tenant of the T Trust. On A's death B became entitled to receive all the income for life. B died January 1st, 1978. C took a life interest on B's death. When C died in 1994, D took on being absolutely entitled.

A died - January 1st, 1970 - disposal (subsection (4)).

B died January 1st, 1978 - no disposal (subsection (6)).

C died January 1st, 1994 - disposal as D takes absolutely (there will have been a liability to capital gains tax on January 1st, 1985).

Deemed disposal

Subsection (7) is a further application of the fifteen-year disposal theme. Under this subsection, if there is a period of more than fifteen years throughout which there is no life interest in possession of the settled property, then, at the end of the first fifteen years of that period and successively at the end of each period of fifteen years there will be a deemed disposal of the assets comprising the trust.

There is, however, a proviso to subsection (7) in so far as the subsection will not apply to settled property if it and the income from it is wholly or primarily applicable for educational, cultural or recreational purposes, and the beneficiaries are not persons who are connected with the settlor in accordance with paragraph 21 of Schedule 7.

At this point it is convenient to mention the effect of the interplay between subsections (7) and (10). Subsection (7) has the effect of taxing at regular intervals the gains of funds held on discretionary and accumulating trusts. Subsection (10) (c) in defining 'life interest' excludes annuities 'notwithstanding that the annuity is payable out of or charged on settled property or the income of settled property'.

Annuities

Where an executor has to service an annuity under the terms of a will, he will probably choose a fixed interest investment with a dated life that is such that the stock will outlive the annuitant. Such a stock on purchase will undoubtedly stand at a discount. Under the provisions of subsection (7) capital gains tax will be payable on each gain on a deemed disposal as the value of the stock increases on nearing its redemption date. Since the tax on the gain will be paid from the settled fund, the fund which produces the income will be depleted and the income consequently reduced, probably to below the amount required to pay the annuity. If there is a power to resort to capital to make up the shortfall of income, the remainderman will suffer not only to the amount of the capital gains tax and the shortfall of income but also to the extent of the income tax to be paid under section 170 of the Income Tax Act 1952 on the grossed up amount of the shortfall of income of the annuity.

Subsection (7) is further subject to other provisions found in subsection (13). Under this subsection the operation of the fifteen-year rule where there is no life interest in possession is dependent upon which of two classes the settlement falls into. The two classes are:

- (a) Settlements created before April 6th, 1950, in which case the successive periods of fifteen years must be taken from the date of creation of the settlement up to a date falling between April 6th, 1950, and April 6th, 1965 (i.e. a settlement of March 1st, 1918), and
- (b) Settlements created on or after April 6th, 1950, in which case the fifteen-year period starts to run from the date of the settlement.

But there is a 'holiday' until April 7th, 1957, in so far as the termination of a life interest before that date will not bring the 'deemed disposal' provision of section 25 (4) into effect, nor will it affect the base year from which subsection (7) will begin to run.

It may well be that the result of the introduction of the fifteen-year cycle of deemed disposals will be the use by conveyancers of leases with a duration of sixteen years. In cases where there is no right to a renewal of the lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, or other similar legislation, the value of the remainder of a sixteen-year lease, when fifteen years have expired, can be expected to be small.

Charitable trusts

Earlier I mentioned the proviso to subsection (7) which applied when settled property was enjoyed for educational, cultural and recreational purposes. It is therefore appropriate to give some attention to the provisions of section 35 in connection with charitable trusts. While subsection (1) of section 35 exempts from capital gains tax any gain accruing to a charity while it is applied for charitable purposes, subsection (2) provides that when property ceases to be held for charitable purposes the trustees will be treated as if they had disposed of, and immediately re-acquired the property for a consideration equal to its market value, any gain on such deemed disposal not being treated as accruing to a charity.

The wording of the subsection is so framed that if during the life of the charitable trust there is an exchange of shares or other property forming the corpus of the trust, then when the trust ceases to be charitable there will be a liability to capital gains tax on any deemed gain at the time of the exchange of shares or other property, as well as any gain arising between the date of exchange and the date when the trust ceases to be held for charitable purposes. The effect of the provision is that when the trust ceases to be held for charitable purposes, there is a liability to capital gains tax on the difference between the value when the property was originally settled and the value when it ceases to be held for charitable purposes. In these circumstances, an assessment may be made within three years from the time when the property ceased to be held on charitable trusts.

Subsection (2) of section 35 is an anti-avoidance subsection to prevent the avoidance of tax when property is settled on trust for a charity with a reversion to the settlor or some other person at some time in the future. Without this provision it would be possible to accumulate gains by means of a charitable trust for the ultimate enjoyment of individuals the settlor wished to benefit without having paid capital gains tax.

Payment of tax

With regard to the payment of capital gains tax, the general principles of chargeability are laid down in Schedule 10, paragraph 12. Sub-paragraph (1) of this paragraph provides that, as in the case of personal representatives on death, the trustees of a settlement may be assessed to tax in respect of the chargeable gains of the settlement. As in the case of personal representatives, the persons assessed shall not include any person not resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

However, section 25 (9) provides that where tax is assessed on the trustees, or a trustee, of a settlement in respect of a chargeable gain accruing to the trustees and it is not paid within six months from the date when it becomes payable by the trustees, or trustee, and before or after the expiration of that period of six months the asset in respect of which the gain accrued, or any part of the proceeds of sale of that asset, is transferred by the trustees to a person who is absolutely entitled to the asset, then that person may, at any time within two years from the time when the tax became payable by the trustees, be assessed and charged to tax on an amount equal to the tax which should have been paid by the trustees, or, in the case where only a part of the asset, or proceeds of the sale of the asset, was transferred, a proportionate part of the amount payable by the trustees.

Disposals by beneficiaries

I will now consider the subject of disposals by beneficiaries. Schedule 7, paragraph 13 (1) provides that a chargeable gain shall not accrue on the disposal of an interest created by or arising under a settlement (which shall include annuities and life interests and the reversions to both) by the person for whose benefit the interest was created by the terms of the settlement or by any other person except one who acquired, or derives his title from one who acquired, the interest for a consideration in money or money's worth, or other consideration consisting of another interest under the settlement.

Sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 13 provides that, subject to sub-paragraph (1) of the paragraph, where a person who has acquired an interest in settled property becomes, as the holder of that interest, absolutely entitled as against the trustee to any settled property, then that person shall be treated as disposing of the interest in consideration of obtaining that settled property, but without prejudice to any gain accruing to the trustee on the disposal of that property deemed to be effected by him under section 25 (3).

The effect of the two sub-paragraphs of paragraph 12 is as follows. The exemption in sub-paragraph (1) extends beyond the original beneficiary to other persons who acquire the interest gratuitously. An example would be a trustee to whom a term or reversionary interest had been assigned. It would also apply when two or more beneficiaries under a settlement exchange their interests and subsequently dispose of the interest they acquired by the exchange.

The exemption does not however apply, by the provisions of sub-paragraph (2), where a person acquires or derives his title to the interest for money or money's worth, and in these circumstances the person who acquires the interest will, on becoming absolutely entitled as against the trustee of the settled property, be treated as disposing of the interest in consideration of obtaining the settled property. The trustee will then be liable to any tax chargeable on any appreciation in the value of assets deemed to be disposed of by him in accordance with section 25 (3) and the person who has acquired the interest will be liable to tax on the disposal he is deemed to have made.

Example 12

In 1960, a settled property on trustees for L for life with remainder to R absolutely.

- (i) On April 7th, 1965, when the assets are valued at £50,000, L and R exchanged their interest so that R became the life-tenant and L the remainderman. The exchange of interest gives no liability to capital gains tax as both L and R were beneficiaries under the original settlement.
- (ii) In 1966, L sold his reversionary interest to P for £40,000. This sale is not chargeable because the consideration L gave for the reversionary interest was another interest under the settlement.
- (iii) In 1967, P died, leaving the reversionary interest to Q. There will be a deemed disposal on P's death with capital gains tax chargeable on any appreciation between the date of purchase by P and the date of his death.
- (iv) In 1968, R died, so that Q became absolutely entitled against the trustee. The personal representatives of R will be liable for capital gains tax on the difference between the value of the assets of the settlement on April 6th, 1965, and the date of R's death. If the value of the assets at R's death was £60,000, his personal representatives will have to pay capital gains tax of 30 per cent on £10,000 = £3,000. Q will also have to pay capital gains tax on £60,000 less £3,000 tax paid by the personal representatives of R less £40,000 paid by P, i.e. 30 per cent on £17,000 = £5,100.

Estate duty

As in the case of deceased estates, special provisions apply in connection with estate duty, on settled property.

Section 26 (2) provides that

'In estimating the principal value of any settled property passing on death, whether it continues to be settled property or not, an allowance shall be made for any capital gains tax chargeable in consequence of the death in respect of the settled property, so far as that tax falls to be paid out of the property so passing or to be borne by any person to whom the property so passes for any beneficial interest in possession.'

The definition subsections, subsections (8) and (9), provide that the treatment of estate duty on settled property shall be similar to that for free estates. In subsection (9) (b) consideration is given to situations where by reason of the provisions of subsection (6) capital gains tax will not accrue on the termination of a life tenancy, but will apply at the end of fifteen years from the previous occasion on which it applied. The proviso to this subsection provides that where, because of the operation of subsection (6) an allowance under subsection (2) is to be made, the amount of the allowance being the capital gains tax payable discounted at a yearly rate of interest of 5 per cent for the period from the date of the termination of the life interest to the end of the said fifteenth year.

Postponement of payment of tax

As noted earlier in connection with deceased estates, the Act provides in Schedule 10, paragraph 4 for the postponement of the payment of capital gains tax. Since the same provisions apply for both deceased estates and settled property I do not propose to repeat the observations I made earlier on this subject when dealing with deceased estates.

Non-resident trusts

I now intend to deal in outline with non-resident trusts. Section 42 provides for the assessment of chargeable gains which accrue to non-resident trusts. The section applies if the trustees of a settlement are not resident and not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, and if the settlor, or one of the settlors,

- (a) is domiciled and either resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom; or
- (b) was domiciled and either resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom when he made the settlement.

If the above circumstances exist a beneficiary under a settlement who is domiciled and resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during any year of assessment is to be charged to capital gains tax on a proportionate part of the gains of the trustees on which they would have been chargeable had they been domiciled and resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during that year. Subsection (2) goes on to provide that any such gain is to be apportioned as is just and reasonable between the persons having interests in the settled property, either life interest or in reversion, according to the respective values of those interests. It may well be that only by negotiation with the Revenue or by a hearing before the Commissioners will it be possible to determine what amount is 'just and reasonable'.

Subsection (3) provides that if in any of the three years ending with that in which a chargeable gain accrues, a beneficiary under a discretionary settlement has received a payment out of income, he will be treated as having an interest in capital of a value equal to that of an annuity of one-third of the total payments he has received in the three years. The beneficiary will then be liable to capital gains tax on the just apportionment of the chargeable gain made to him on the basis of his interest in the settled property. A beneficiary who receives no discretionary payments in the three-year period will have no interest in the settled property attributed to him and so will incur no liability to capital gains tax in respect of any gain realized by the trustees of the settlement.

If a beneficiary, at any time after a gain accrues to the trustees, receives a capital payment out of the trust which represents the whole or part of the gain, he will be chargeable to tax as if the gain, or part of the gain, represented by the capital payment had accrued to him when he received the capital payment. This provision will apply except to the extent to which the gain has been attributed under another part of section 42 to a person domiciled and resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

In the case of settlements made before April 6th, 1965, certain reliefs are given in subsection (4). Under the subsection, the charging provision of subsection (2) shall not apply to a beneficiary whose interest is solely in income and who cannot, by means of the exercise of a power of appointment or revocation or otherwise, obtain for himself, with or without the consent of any other person any part of the capital of the trust. Subsection (4) further provides that the payment of capital gains tax apportioned to a beneficiary in respect of a reversionary interest in capital may be postponed until the beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled to the capital or disposes of all or part of his interest, provided that he is not able, by the exercise of a power, to obtain the capital at an earlier time. For the purposes of subsection (4), property added to a settlement after the settlement is made shall be regarded as property under a separate settlement which was made at the time the property was added.

Two further points need to be remembered in connection with section 42. First, subsection (5) provides that if capital gains tax payable by a beneficiary under a settlement in accordance with section 42 is paid by the trustees of the settlement, it will not be regarded as a payment to such beneficiary for the purposes of taxation. Secondly, subsection (6) provides that no relief will be passed on to beneficiaries in a case where a loss accrues to the trustees of a non-resident trust.

J. M. Barrie in Peter Pan said of death that it was a great adventure. His observation was directed at the person who was engaged in experiencing death at the time. Those of us who in the near future will be engaged in the financial implications of death – and life after death – will find ourselves experiencing a similar adventure into the unknown as we attempt to pick our way through the unseen snares that lie in the 1965 Finance Act and subsequent Finance Acts which will no doubt be heralded as 'clarifying' Acts.

Author's Note

The following proposals appear in the Finance Bill 1966 which has emerged since my paper was prepared.

- (i) Clause 40 provides for the deduction of capital gains tax in certain circumstances in computing the estate duty payable on gifts inter vivos.
- (ii) Schedule 9 – paragraph 1.
Sub-paragraph (1) provides that advances regardless of size will no longer result in a disposal of the whole fund from which the advance is made.

Sub-paragraph (2) provides for a deemed disposal on the death of a beneficiary in the case of an interest pur autre vie as well as on the death of the autre vie.

Sub-paragraph (3) extends the meaning of the term 'life interest'.

Sub-paragraph (4) provides for the exclusion, in specified circumstances, of annuity funds from the payment of capital gains tax every fifteen years.

(iii) Schedule 9 – paragraph 2.

Provides that the relief given under section 34, Finance Act 1965 should be available to the taxpayer if the family business is liquidated at the time of retirement as well as when the taxpayer sells his shares. It is also proposed that the relief shall be available where a taxpayer has been working in the family business for the ten years preceding his retirement, but the business has been incorporated for part of that period and unincorporated for the remainder.

Institute's Annual Service

Archdeacon of London's Address

THE annual service of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, held at the Church of St Margaret, Lothbury, London EC2, on Wednesday of last week, was attended by the President and other officers and members of the Council; a good number of other members of the Institute were also present.

Conducted by the Rev. A. J. Drewett, M.A., B.Sc., Rector of St Margaret and Rural Dean of the City, the service commenced with the hymn 'Praise to the Holiest in the height'. After the singing of part of Psalm 119, the lesson from Ephesians, chapter 4, verses 25–32, was read by the President, Sir Henry Benson, C.B.E., F.C.A.

The other hymns were 'God be in my head' and 'All creatures of our God and King'. The collection for the Chartered Accountants' Benevolent Association amounted to £51 15s 6d.

The address was given by the Venerable Martin Gloster Sullivan, M.A., Archdeacon of London.

The Address

'Judas Iscariot had the purse and carried what was therein.'
(St John XII, part of vv. 4 and 6)

It may be something of a shock to begin a sermon to members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants with a reference to Judas Iscariot, the traitor among Christ's band of twelve disciples. It is not, however, in this connection that I have chosen the text, but rather because of the reference to Judas as the treasurer of that small company.

There is a false notion in many people's minds that Jesus as a historical person (if people believe He is so human) lived on air and in the air and that mundane matters like food, clothing and the cost of living did not affect Him. He simply waved a wand and all his wants were supplied. That, of course, is a travesty. He depended (as we do), and His friends with Him, on the same kind of resources as are available to us.

His needs were simple. He walked everywhere because even public transport was not available in his day. He had no fixed abode, and in that sense – and indeed in that sense only – He was something of a vagrant. He relied on the hospitality of His friends and on their generosity in cash and kind. But He went further than that; He had to depend on His own resources as well and on those of His twelve companions.

When money was short He, like us, had to find it; and like us (or some of us) He went out to work to earn it. He was a carpenter, capable of going back to the bench to earn a day's wages. Some of His disciples who were fishermen could trawl the Lake of Galilee. One of them was a kind of embryo accountant. Matthew, the tax collector before he became a member of Christ's fellowship, had lived by exploiting his fellow countrymen, but he could doubtless turn to an honest day's living. We know nothing about most of the others, but they must have come from some work to which, if necessary, from time to time, they could return.

Judas Iscariot was the treasurer. His job was to keep the books honestly and to tell his friends when they were short of cash and what they needed. He would bring them down to earth when their high-minded ideas outran their common sense. On this subject he may have had many a private word with Jesus Himself.

Let me give you an illustration of such a moment when Judas, the accountant, clashed with Jesus, the idealist. It is recorded in the chapter from which I have drawn my text. It happened upon a day that a woman – who owed an incalculable debt to Christ who had redeemed her from a life of waste and shame, rehabilitated her and given her back her self-respect and offered her hope for the future – burst in at a supper party where He was a guest, and after the custom of those days, sought in some way to show her gratitude. She brought an expensive box of ointment with her and proceeded to use this to anoint Christ's feet.

Judas was shocked by this act of prodigality and openly expressed his concern. This was sheer waste. If the woman desired to do something practical to express her gratitude, she could have sold the box for quite a tidy sum and, he added (perhaps with his tongue in his cheek), given the money to the poor. He himself was the treasurer of a band of poor men and his purse could have been a fitting receptacle. Perhaps this is an unworthy suggestion, although I am bound to say that I have often found that those who disapprove of acts such as this woman performed always argue that they can be turned into cash and given to some charity. I likewise have found this seldom happens.

This, therefore, is a moment which strikes an echoing

FOR STUDENTS

Why Become a Limited Company?

WHEN a private business becomes a limited company, there is a tendency for the grapevine to quiver with anticipation and for amateur financiers to propound with disturbing gestures, theories which they are quite unable to defend but which, when couched in suitable terms, may carry some conviction. In this way the mountain is often missed for the molehill.

When such a change of status occurs the wise man may suspect that some scheme is being, or has been, devised to evade or minimize tax or estate duty. The wiser man may suspect that business is a little uncertain or some project is afoot the results of which are not certain enough to promise years of plenty.

The man on the Clapham omnibus may suspect that the proprietor of the business is seeking the glory that the word 'limited' after his name is expected to supply. The man on the Clapham omnibus is the more likely to be right.

This idea that a limited company is in a position to command respect not accorded to a private trader is naturally false. Creditors will grow more cautious and the modification will be apparent principally to the immediate family to whom it will be little more than a source of wonder and amusement; to the customs officer who will be more likely to increase suspicion than respect; to the tax inspector who will make a mental note to inquire more closely; and to the solicitor and accountant who collect the fees. There is a suggestion that the honour may be dearly bought.

What are the real issues that should decide such a change of structure in any business?

There are six supposed advantages to the limited company. Let us consider each in turn.

1. Perpetual succession

The company is separate from those controlling it. It remains after the effective proprietor is gone. He can leave his shares among his wife and children. However, should he remain a sole trader the next of kin will inherit as he wishes and, should there be no children, he is unlikely to want to make special provisions for preserving the identity of the enterprise.

Should he become personally bankrupt it will be essential to sell or liquidate the company and therefore nothing is gained on this account by the change.

2. Limited liability

Existing creditors are not affected. Future credit may become more difficult to obtain, depending on the creditors' assessment of the change. The advantage lies principally in providing a safeguard in an emergency. However, it is well to remember that if a director is judged to have contributed to the failure of a company by fraud or other misdealing, then he is in no better position than a bankrupt private trader, for in addition to being heavily fined he may be prevented from acting as a director.

3. Facilities for raising funds

There are few facilities available to the company that are not available to the private trader. True a company can issue shares, but the family company does not wish to give away any controlling power. There are, of course, debentures but these are equivalent to loans on security of business assets and would probably need a separate guarantee in any event.

An audited balance sheet can be produced by any organization and has the same value when signed by the same persons; limited liability is the one factor likely to prove a disadvantage.

The one exception to these generalizations is that an organization such as Industrial and Commercial Finance Corporation will only lend to companies, but then its minimum is £5,000.

4. Taxation

There is no difference in the expenditure which can be charged against income for tax purposes. However, where there are sources of income which to an individual would be 'unearned' then forming a company could be an advantage provided that all income could be drawn as salary and therefore earn earned income relief. However, the Revenue can limit the amount to be drawn. The balance must then be taken as dividends (if at all). These will be liable to income tax in addition to the corporation tax already paid, i.e. profits drawn as dividends will be doubly taxed – a serious disadvantage.

The profits could be ploughed back. If so, then capital is increased. There is, however, the danger of a surtax direction where the Revenue is of the opinion that the avoidance of tax was the prime cause of the decision not to pay dividends.

Profits forcibly paid out in this way will be liable to corporation tax, dividend tax and surtax – the first two equalling perhaps 16s in the £. The private trader can at least avoid the first mentioned tax.

Where estate duty is concerned, the amount payable is not likely to be influenced by the formation of a company where the shares are retained by the trader. It is, however, possible for the 'owner' to distribute shares to prospective beneficiaries – thus saving duty and retaining both income and control. The advantage will be lost if it is necessary to break up the business to pay duty. As a private trader, he could do this by parting with capital and making the other parties limited partners.

This might be preferable as, although limited partners have a certain nuisance value as regards payment of profit shares, they do not participate in control.

5. Organization

Problems of organization occur when a business reaches a certain size and more than one person is needed to control it. These persons may wish for a share in profits. It is possible to form a partnership, but unless limited, it is likely to be disadvantageous to the original proprietor. A limited partnership would probably not be suitable and a company the only solution.

6. Transfer of ownership

Shares can be transferred easily in part or in whole. This is not so true in a private business where it would be necessary (to preserve capital) to form a partnership, nor in a partnership where splitting of capital presents problems and would have the effect of introducing new partners.

The sole trader by forming a company can distribute shares to kith and kin while retaining control and maintaining income.

This could be done by creation of a limited partnership, but limited partners are handicapped by the fact that they cannot dispose of their holding without retaining liability. In the circumstances this would probably not be a much sought after status.

Other factors

If the original business was a partnership and not that of a sole trader, there are certain other factors to dwell upon.

With reference to perpetual succession, the bankruptcy, death or other disappearance of a partner will dissolve the partnership. Contingencies such as death or retirement can be provided for in the agreement but it is still necessary to pay out the appropriate share. This may need to be done quickly for duty purposes or in the case of a private bankruptcy. The formation of a company can ease this situation. However, if the 'partner' leaving is the 'senior partner', it could still be necessary for the survivors to buy him out by purchase of shares in the company in order to retain control.

With regard to limited liability, bankruptcy of the firm involves bankruptcy of all partners and dissolution of the partnership. Each partner is liable for all debts and a creditor can attack his private assets leaving him to look for redress from the others. Formation of a company can save dissolution but the same remarks apply to partners as did to sole traders.

As for organizational problems, if the partners cannot agree in matters of control, formation of a company is unlikely to help except by enabling one partner to dispose of his interest more easily.

Two final points applicable in all instances are that companies cannot be formed by certain professional firms nor can a partnership exist with more than twenty partners.

Finally, if a new Companies Act comes into force embodying the provisions of the recently abandoned Companies Bill there is also the question of having to disclose more information than effective proprietors may wish.

Taxation Case

Central and District Properties Limited v. C.I.R.

In the House of Lords - May 18th, 1966

Stamp duty - Exemption - Transferor and transferee companies - Acquisition of shares - Third party selling shares in transferee company - Whether consideration still 90 per cent of shares in transferee company - Finance Act 1927, section 55.

The appellant company had an issued capital of 250,000 fully paid preference shares of £1 each and 1,343,000 fully paid ordinary stock units. The controlling interest in the company was held by another company (Unicos), which had an issued capital of 646,460 'A' preference shares, 55,653 'B' preference shares, 240,598 'C' preference shares and one million ordinary shares.

The appellant made the following offer to the shareholders in Unicos: for each 'A' preference share, one 6½ per cent preference share in the appellant and 9d cash; for each 'B' preference share, ten 6½ per cent preference shares in the appellant and 4s cash; for each 'C' preference share, one 6½ per cent preference share in the appellant and no cash, and for each ordinary share, two ordinary shares in the appellant, three 'D' ordinary shares of 4s each and 8s cash. The total value of the consideration was £5,078,960 of which £4,643,588 was represented by the shares in the appellant, while the balance of £453,372 was in cash. The offer became unconditional. At that stage therefore the consideration was within section 55 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1927 because over 90 per cent of the consideration was in shares of the transferee company.

On the same day a finance company (Leadenhall) offered for sale, by way of negotiable letters of entitlement, 1,443,588 ordinary stock units in the appellant to the preference shareholders in Unicos. Each holder of £1 of preference capital in Unicos was to be entitled to buy one ordinary stock unit in the appellant at the price of 9s 3d. The negotiable letters of entitlement could be dealt in on the Stock Exchange; and at the relevant time the ordinary stock units in the appellant were quoted at 14s to 15s, and so the quotation for the letters of entitlement was 4s 3d selling price and 5s 3d buying price.

It was contended by the respondent that the 4s 3d was part of the 'consideration for the acquisition' of the Unicos shares within section 55 (1) (c); and that therefore the provision of the consideration for that acquisition was less than 90 per cent in shares of the appellant.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal): the offer by Leadenhall of the 1,443,588 ordinary stock units in the appellant company to the Unicos shareholders at an undervalue was a part of the consideration for the transfer of their shares; and that therefore the stipulation in section 55 (1) (c) (ii) that shares in the appellant company should constitute not less than 90 per cent of the consideration for the transfer of the Unicos shares.

Current Law

English Settlement: Appointor with Foreign Domicil

THE settlor in Re Khan's Settlement, Coutts & Co v. Senior Dowager Begum of Bhopal and Others ([1966], 1 All E.R. 160) made in England a settlement in English form whereunder he had a general testamentary power of appointment over the settled funds. He made a will in English for disposing of his property in the United Kingdom and Southern Ireland. By this will he bequeathed pecuniary legacies to three of his heirs under Mohammedan law, and other legacies to persons who were not his heirs and gave the residue in favour of his legal heirs in accordance with Mohammedan law. He died domiciled in India and by the Islamic law of his domicil no legacy to an heir could take effect without the consent of the other heirs or pro rata with the consent of an individual heir. These heirs, other than the three to whom pecuniary legacies were given, did not consent to the legacies appointed by the will being paid. The law of the domicil knew nothing of powers of appointment. The question at issue was whether the settlement funds were available to pay the pecuniary legatees.

Russell, L.J. (sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division), found that the testator in exercising his general testamentary power of appointment over the settled fund had effected a blending or massing of it with his free estate, and that he had thereby subjected the whole to the law of succession of his domicil, including restrictions on testamentary disposition. It followed that just as the pecuniary legacies could not be paid out of the testator's free estate, so also they could not be paid out of the settled funds. In so deciding his lordship followed Re Pryce, Lawford v. Pryce ([1911], 2 Ch. 286) and did not follow Re Waite's Settlement Trusts, Westminster Bank Ltd v. Brouard ([1957], 1 All E.R. 629).

Attachment of Debt Owed by Company

S LTD was a creditor of C Ltd, and signed judgment against it under Order 14 of the Rules of the Supreme Court for £407 12s 1d and £20 costs. C Ltd had at the time no assets available to satisfy the judgment, but some three months later a claim which it had against an insurance company was settled at 1,000 guineas and, on June 20th, 1963, S Ltd applied for and obtained a garnishee order nisi against that sum to the extent of its debt. Notice was given of a meeting of C Ltd to be held on July 10th with a view to winding-up the company. This came to S Ltd's notice on June 24th. Nevertheless, on July 4th the garnishee order was made absolute, and at 10 a.m. on July 10th the insurance company paid to S Ltd, the garnished sum. Two hours later a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of C Ltd. In Re Caribbean Products (Yam Imports) Ltd Tickle v. Swains Packaging Ltd ([1966], 1 All E.R. 181) the liquidator of C Ltd claimed that S Ltd could not retain the money received as the result of the attachment but must return it to him. Section 325 (1) of the Companies Act 1948 provides that where a creditor has attached any debt due to the company and the company is subsequently wound up, he is not to be entitled to retain the benefit of the attachment against the liquidator in the winding-up unless he has completed the attachment by receipt of the debt before the date on which he had notice of a meeting for voluntary winding-up.

The Court of Appeal held that the effect of this provision was that the fruits of an attachment received by the creditor before he has such notice were outside the section, but if received after he had such notice must be accounted for and paid to the liquidator, subject to the Court's discretionary jurisdiction, under proviso (c) to subsection (1) of the section, to set aside the liquidator's rights in favour of the creditor, a jurisdiction which their lordships declined to exercise in the present case. In so holding the Court of Appeal overruled Re Rainbow Tours Ltd ([1963], 2 All E.R. 820).

Rating Relief for Charity

SOLDIERS', Sailors' and Airmen's Families Association v. Merton Corporation ([1966], 2 All E.R. 31) was an application by the plaintiff association, a body incorporated by Royal charter, claiming a declaration that it was entitled to rating relief under section 11 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation Act 1961, in respect of premises owned by it and comprising seventy-eight flats occupied by the dependants of deceased officers of the armed forces. The question at issue was whether the residents were in rateable occupation of their flats, in which case there was no entitlement to relief, or whether it was the charity itself which was in occupation in the course of carrying out its charitable activity, in which case it was entitled to the relief sought. In the allocation of flats priority was given to those applicants whose incomes were below a certain figure. On being accepted each applicant entered into a tenancy agreement whereby she agreed to abide by regulations made by the committee that managed the flats, whether made before or during her residence. The flats were unfurnished, the residents providing their own furniture. They had their own keys. The electricity and gas supply was separately metered to each flat, and the residents arranged their own heating appliances. A resident could be turned out for any cause, or without giving a reason, on one month's notice. Residents were obliged to have a co-resident if the committee considered it to be advisable for reasons of ill-health, infirmity or senility. There were restrictions on visitors, and on the residents being absent from their flats.

On those facts Buckley, J., held that the plaintiff was carrying on the charitable activity of making living accommodation available to needy dependants of deceased officers in consequence of which the charity itself was in occupation of the premises and entitled to relief.

Associated Fire Alarms

THE accounts of Associated Fire Alarms, from which this week's reprint is taken, are those on which the London Stock Exchange Council decided to grant the resumption of dealings in the company's shares after a suspension of very nearly a year. As the auditors' report shows, the 1965 accounts are 'clean' except in relation to the keeping of debtors' accounts, but the report is qualified as to capitalizations of rented apparatus in 1962, 1963 and 1964.

In 1965, new installations of rented apparatus have been capitalized at a figure of £536,710 which corresponds with the total costings. It is the equivalent of five years' purchase of the rental income of £107,432 arising from the installations. In 1964 five years' purchase was used but in 1962 and 1963 a fourteen years' basis was adopted. By 1971 all capitalizations of installations in 1964 and earlier years will have been written off completely.

Consideration was given, it is understood, to unscrambling the previous accounting basis but that operation would have involved protracted tax negotiations, amongst other things, and the revised board headed by Mr Ian T. Morrow, C.A., F.C.W.A., considered it advisable to start the company off again, as it were, with a clean sheet.

Clearing up

In August last year, when Mr Morrow took over the chairmanship, he found a position of virtual collapse in administration. Incoming payments, apparently, were simply being posted to 'Suspense' and inevitably there was a vast clearing up job to be done. Despite all efforts there was still an 'immense number' of queries to be cleared by the end of the financial year.

Staff were divided into two teams, one to maintain the ledger for current transactions on a normal basis and the other to clear up the old business. Inevitably considerable special provisions have been considered necessary. In total they amount to £685,060, the largest single item being £350,000 for doubtful debts. Development expenditure is to be written off as incurred and this involves a write-off of £80,054.

Borrowings which reached a peak of £2,375,000 at the end of last August had been reduced by £100,000 by the end of the financial year and have been since reduced by a similar amount. Creditors by the end of December had been reduced by over £200,000 as against the peak figure in the middle of 1965.

Current profitability

The loss for the year at £707,000 was £4,000 heavier than in 1964, but effective cost reductions made by the new board indicate the probability that the 1965 loss arose only in the first seven or eight months of the year. Trading results for the first quarter of 1966 showed an improvement over the same period in 1965, Mr Morrow says, 'in so far as can be ascertained from the incomplete records for the beginning of 1965'.

It is estimated that in the first quarter of this year the company broke even on the basis of rentals being capitalized at estimated total cost. Subject to the volume of business being maintained and there being no further substantial increase in costs, the company may be running at a small profit at the end of 1966. That anticipation, Mr Morrow points out, does not allow for the industrial training levy and the selective employment tax, the incidence of both of which is, as yet, uncertain.

Negotiations are in hand for the sale of H. H. Green & Co (Pty), the company's Australian electrical contracting subsidiary. If the negotiations are successful about £350,000 will become available to reduce borrowings.

At the annual meeting last week, Harmood-Banner, Cash, Stone & Mounsey, who independently investigated the company's position last year, were appointed to act as joint auditors with Tansley Witt & Co. A number of shareholders at the meeting were fully prepared to rake up the past but they found Mr Morrow equally prepared to concentrate on the present and the future. Little purpose seems now to be served by recrimination. Encouragement for the new board would be more helpful.

Danger

AT a recent City Press conference concerning a new share offer, the subject of providing figures cropped up. The prospectus contained no figure for turnover. Would there be one in the company's accounts, the chairman was asked.

The reply, in effect, was 'No. To give a turnover figure would be dangerous'. The shares in question were to be quoted on the Northern Stock Exchange and it was pointed out that the Northern Stock Exchange would soon be coming into line with the London Stock Exchange's requirement on the provision of turnover figures.

The company then, it seemed, would comply with the Northern Stock Exchange's stipulation and that gave rise to the obvious interjection 'Won't turnover figures be dangerous then?' A fair question to which there was no immediate answer.

The supposition must be that if all companies show turnover figures the disclosures do not invite 'danger' to any single company. For a single company to provide the figure voluntarily is a highly dangerous procedure. Comment on such thinking is best left unwritten, or, like 'est' in those long Latin lesson sentences, 'understood'.

This Balance Sheet is to be read in conjunction with the Notes on pages [83 and 84].

Capitalisations to 31st December, 1964, at £3,730,648, was the cumulative result of differing bases adopted in previous years. For the 13 years up to 1960 this item was shown in the accounts as "Net Book Value at 30th June 1948, with subsequent additions at cost". In 1961 new installations were included "at the Company's valuation". For the years 1962 and 1963 a valuation of 14 years purchase of the annual gross rental income was used. For the years 1964 and 1965 a valuation of 15 years purchase of the annual gross rental income was used. The valuation for 1964 was based on a five-year purchase of gross rentals arising from installations made during that year.

Provision for depreciation has been made on various bases over the years resulting in an aggregate of £1,197,680 at 31st December, 1964. In 1964 an amount of £373,064 was charged, representing 10% on the amount originally capitalised in each year, including the 1964 capitalisation. The capitalisations in 1962, 1963 and 1964 as depreciated up to 31st December, 1965, are as follows:

1962	1,147,496	639,318
1963	1,301,804	820,257
1964	493,895	393,181
	£2,943,195	£1,852,756

In 1965 new installations have been capitalised at £536,710 which corresponds with the total costings. The annual rental income arising from such installations is £107,432. The basis of the depreciation charge for the year of £428,671 is set out in Note 6 and the charge of £375,000 in respect of installations in 1964 and prior years has been deemed to include the necessary adjustments in respect of rented installations subsequently withdrawn.

Note 4—Debtors

Total of Debtors Balances of the Parent Company	£
Less: Cash received but not allocated	2,055,098
	741,700
Provision for Bad and Doubtful Debts	£1,314,398

During 1965, particularly in the early part of the year, there was a marked deterioration in the maintenance of the Debtors' Ledgers which, at 31st December, resulted in the large figure of unallocated cash receipts shown above (£741,700). Statements of account for monies due were not regularly submitted to customers prior to 30th September, 1965.

This situation has made it difficult to assess by normal processes the proper provision to be made for Bad and Doubtful Debts. Nevertheless, in making an additional provision in 1965 of £350,000, the Directors believe that the total of £492,028 now made available should be adequate to cover the position. The accounting has since improved but, despite the intensive efforts being applied, it will be many months before all old balances have been agreed with customers and the accounts are cleared. Customers' ledger accounts representing current trading are up to date and statements are being sent on a normal basis.

REPORT OF THE AUDITORS TO THE MEMBERS

We have examined the annexed Balance Sheet and have obtained all the information and explanations which we considered necessary for our audit. Proper books of account have been kept except for the recording of the debtors' ledgers referred to as Note 4. The Balance Sheet is in agreement with the books of account. We have examined the annexed Consolidated Balance Sheet and Consolidated Profit and Loss Account. The Accounts of some of the Subsidiary Companies have been audited by other firms. In our opinion, the Balance Sheet and the Consolidated Balance Sheet and Consolidated Profit and Loss Account together with the Notes relating thereto on pages [83 and 84] comply with the requirements of the Companies Act, 1948.

The Balance Sheet and the Consolidated Balance Sheet give a true and fair view of the state of the affairs at 31st December 1965, with the exception of the amount capitalised for rented equipment for the years 1962, 1963 and 1964, namely £2,943,195 now depreciated to £1,852,756 and specifically referred to by the Directors at Note 3.

The Consolidated Profit and Loss Account gives a true and fair view of the loss of the Group for the year ended 31st December, 1965.

CITY NOTES

THE Bank of England's pressure operation on the money market over the past two or three weeks has forced interest rates to levels bordering on the maximum under 6 per cent Bank rate conditions. Up to the time of writing there have been all the signs of a Bank rate rise without the rise itself. The operation has been mounted following the heavy June drain on the currency reserves as a direct result of the shipping strike and half-year influences.

The rise in interest rates in London, however, has not, as yet, had any pronounced or visible effect on sterling. The Bank's expertise in the market has been grudgingly acknowledged but it is not necessarily the answer to the longer-term problems of sterling or the economy.

Whether or not those problems will lead to a further general stiffening of credit conditions or the 'further measures' so ardently forecast, remains to be seen. A pronounced economic 'stop' internally would be against basic Government policy in so far as that policy can be detected.

The external view of the British economy is that there should be a complete reappraisal of needs and intentions. The necessarily short-term intervention in money rates is seen as an emergency rather than a longer term solution.

THE queue of potential debenture borrowers is currently stretching from here to October. The institutions have been in command of this end of the capital market for some time and are now virtually dictating terms and timing. The  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent level of debenture borrowing is gradually giving way to  $7\frac{3}{4}$  per cent and may, it is suggested, eventually give way to 8 per cent borrowing over the next few months. Even so, the industrial debenture borrowing demand shows little sign of slackening.

Meanwhile, the biggest preference capital-loan stock switch since the introduction of corporation tax is being introduced with Unilever Ltd offering loan stock in place of present preference capital. Preference holders concerned with franked income, however, are offered the opportunity to opt out of the scheme. Courtaulds are also considering their preference capital position.

* * * *

ALL the leading banks, in their interim reports, have reported increased funds and turnover but at the same time have pointed to the probability of lower current year earnings. The 'stop' on bank lending, the lower average level of interest rates compared with last year when Bank rate was 7 per cent, and inevitably rising costs are the causes of profit pressure. The banks' plans for Saturday closing have received an early setback in the inability of the Government to find time for the introduction of the necessary legislation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, has promised to look into the position when the Prices and Incomes Board has reported its findings on bank charges.

THERE is a common theme of apprehension in the mid-year crop of stockbrokers' investment surveys. Accent is placed on the obvious economic doubts and on the equally obvious determination of investors to ignore them. Technical conditions in the stock-market itself have helped to hoist equity prices to levels which, in many cases, are difficult to justify in terms of earnings potential. This does not prevent stockbrokers from making specialized equity investment suggestions but the tone of their reports suggests that, like many onlookers, they tend to distrust the general level of equity prices.

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council that a clerk under articles to a fellow of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales had been guilty of acts or defaults namely that during the period from August 1964 to October 1965 having been required to prepare certain sales control accounts for a client of his principal's firm he deliberately falsified such accounts so as to render himself liable to be declared unfit to become a member of the Institute or to have the registration of his articles of clerkship suspended for a period not exceeding two years or to be reprimanded or admonished. The Committee found that the formal complaint had been proved and the Committee ordered that the articulated clerk be reprimanded but considered that there existed special circumstances justifying the omission of his name from the publication of the Finding and Decision.

Increasing Administrative Burden of Fiscal Legislation

Correspondence exchanged by the President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury referred to in the report of the meeting on July 6th of the Council of the Institute at page 86 of this issue.

Letter dated June 8th, 1966, from Mr J. Diamond, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, to the President.

As I promised at our meeting on May 31st, I have given further thought to the suggestion that the Institute and the other accountancy bodies should set up a joint standing committee to be available for consultation with the Inland Revenue and other Government departments.

As you know, we are always glad to draw on the expert knowledge of the accountancy profession and we greatly value the help it gives us, though as I explained, there must be limits to the scope of consultation. Such limits as exist to the scope of consultation arise from the framework within which we all work and not from deficiencies in the machinery for consultation. In particular, it is not possible to seek the profession's views on questions of Budget policy before the Budget, and the short interval between the Budget and the publication of the Finance Bill leaves no time for consultation on the details of the Bill. There seems, therefore, to be no alternative to the present procedure, under which the Institute comments on the Bill after publication and subsequently discusses the points that arise with the Inland Revenue.

So far as the Government are concerned, it seems to us that the present informal arrangements work satisfactorily, both in relation to the Finance Bill and in matters that arise at other times of the year, and we do not feel the need for a more formal channel of communication. Reference of any matter to the Institute itself means that the Institute can expeditiously put the matter to those members who are expert on the facts at issue. You mentioned that members of a standing committee would be available for consultation at short notice, but I cannot help thinking that the arrangement might in the result lead to delay.

Letter dated June 13th, 1966, from the President to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

Thank you for your letter dated June 8th, 1966. We very much appreciated your seeing us on May 31st.

We are sorry that the Government feels that standing consultative arrangements with the accountancy profession are unnecessary. Naturally we appreciate the difficulty of prior consultation on matters involving questions of Budget policy.

The accountancy profession is always willing, as you know, to make available its special knowledge and skill to help the Government in any way it can. I hope the departments will be encouraged to approach us for consultation whenever they think we can help. We ourselves keep a close watch on developments which impinge on the work of the profession and get in touch with the departments concerned immediately when we think we have useful and proper points to make but the drawback of leaving the initiative to us is that by the time they come to our notice matters may have been carried to such a stage that changes which might be highly desirable are for technical reasons not always practicable.

We are still studying possible means of easing the administrative burden of capital gains tax, following our discussion with you on May 31st, and hope we may shortly be in a position to suggest an acceptable solution.

OBITUARY

Sir Bernhard Binder, F.C.A.

It is with regret that we record the death at his home in London last Monday, at the age of 89, of Sir Bernhard Binder, F.C.A., a former senior partner in Binder, Hamlyn & Co, and President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in 1948-49.

Sir Bernhard's career was a romantic one. After being a junior clerk in Yorkshire and then in Nottingham - his native city - he travelled to London and at the age of 20 took a post as a correspondence clerk, a position for which he had qualified by teaching himself shorthand. Several years later he joined the staff of McAuliffe, Davies & Hope (later amalgamated with Turquand, Youngs & Co) where he was subsequently given articles, so enabling him to qualify as a member of the Institute which he did in 1908 after passing the Final examination first in order of merit. He then became associated, firstly as accountant and financial manager and then as director, with various companies developing public utilities in South America until 1918 when he founded, in conjunction with Mr Ralph Hamlyn, the firm of Binder, Hamlyn & Co.

As a result of his varied experience of the management and administration of companies, Sir Bernhard was asked in 1920 to reorganize and advise two Austrian banks and to advise on financial matters regarding an Austrian League of Nations loan. He later undertook important work on behalf of Government departments, including the investigation in 1927 of the financial position of the Portuguese Government for a proposed loan, and an investigation for the Colonial Office into the position of the clove industry in Zanzibar.

Sir Bernhard was also chairman and director of a number of public companies, and as a member of the Council of the Institute for twenty-five years gave valuable service to the profession.

The North Yorkshire and South Durham Branch, now re-named the Tees-side Society of Chartered Accountants, held six lecture meetings during the year, all of which were well supported. # BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION AND MANAGEMENT

by C. S. DEVERELL, M.A., B.SC.(ECON.), B.COM., F.C.I.S., A.M.B.I.M.

National Productivity Year was a singularly appropriate time for the appearance of this book, the more so as recent events have underlined the need to extend the most effective methods of management to the whole of our industry and commerce. Professional associations have recognized the urgency of this matter. Nor is the recognition limited to such bodies as the British Institute of Management and the Institution of Works Managers. The importance of business administration has been stressed in the revised examination scheme of the Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, the Chartered Institute of Secretaries, and the Corporation of Secretaries. At the same time, many colleges of technology and commerce have introduced courses leading to Diplomas in Business Studies which require a knowledge of modern management techniques. University students engaged on B.Sc. Economics or similar courses are expected to acquire a sound basic understanding of the field. They, and all the students pursuing the courses mentioned here, should find the book invaluable.

ANOTHER BOOK IN THE GEE'S WORLD MANAGEMENT SERIES

by C. S. DEVERELL, M.A., B.Sc.(Econ.), B.COM., F.C.I.S., A.M.B.I.M.

Most of us concerned in business, industry, public administration or training would like to write and speak more effectively, whatever the level of our present attainment. We have to interview, write reports, attend conferences and discussion groups, speak at meetings, and get the most we can from suggestion schemes. We are equally aware that the complexities of business today call for skill and training, if shortcomings in communication are to be removed. This book will be of inestimable service to managerial and professional students, but it is more than a textbook. It is a practical guide, with all its examples drawn from business. It should also stimulate those engaged in industrial and commercial training. The author believes that one of the most obstinate difficulties we face is that of maintaining a high level of freshness, enthusiasm and creativity. How can we make certain that the right information reaches the right people in the right form at the right time? Has the exercise of the techniques of communication been given sufficient prominence in executive training programmes? This book is above all a review and an opportunity for personal stocktaking. All managers should find something in its pages which they can profitably read.

Pertinent Question No. 2

"What's Cupid got to do with the NSPCC"?

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is NOT a matrimonial bureau - but it does like to help romance along! Marital troubles may lead to distress for the children. And where there's a child in distress, there's the NSPCC . . . working for a better relationship between the parents, if that's the cause of the trouble. The NSPCC does MORE than help cruelly assaulted children. It exists to help children in any and every way possible. In turn, it needs YOUR help. ### STOCKTAKING

Stock-taking, whether conducted by outside valuers or the firm's own staff, is of little value unless it is carefully synchronized with the books.

Crisis Measures

THE raising of Bank rate to 7 per cent and the promise of an intensified credit squeeze confirm what was already self-evident, i.e. that the £ sterling is under considerable pressure which could, in theory, compel the Government to devalue. This is not just another balance of payments crisis such as we have become familiar with during the past two decades; it is the most serious since the 1949 devaluation. MR WILSON may have been justified in blaming the present crisis on the seamen's strike and the rising price of copper, but these are merely marginal factors which have been superimposed upon an economy which has been unstable not merely for the past two or twenty-two months, but for the past twenty years.

The increase in Bank rate must be seen as a largely technical measure to keep U.K. interest rates in alignment with the upward drift of rates overseas. It needs to be remembered that once confidence in sterling has evaporated, no increase in Bank rate will hold – much less attract – foreign money. Unlike the higher Bank rate, the promise of tighter credit may help the economy. Even so, it will only be at the expense of higher unemployment, the deferment of new investment, and the end of such growth as has been experienced during the past two years.

At the time of writing, additional measures are promised which, it is declared, will demonstrate to the public and more particularly to Britain's overseas creditors, the Government's determination to defend the present sterling parity. Devaluation, it seems, is to be prevented at all costs. There are critics, however – not all outside the Cabinet – who would contend that to subordinate all hopes of economic growth, upon which the future prosperity of the U.K. economy depends, to the defence of sterling is short-sighted. In contrast, they say, devaluation would bring to an end the present uncertainty, it would free the U.K. economy of the need to adjust the internal level of demand and activity to every shift in the trade figures and thus provide the spring-board from which, to use the current jargon, a take-off into a new era of growth could be effected.

Nevertheless, the case against devaluation, particularly if it should appear that it has been forced upon a reluctant Government, is even stronger. Devaluation of sterling will do nothing to eradicate the basic weaknesses of the U.K. economy from which the present plight of the £ stems. Even if it is true that it would offer the opportunity to carry out new policies to revive the U.K. economy, it is equally true that such steps could be taken without the prior step of devaluation. The argument for devaluation rests on the situation when a country's balance of payments is persistently in deficit due to the fact that its export prices are non-competitive. This is hardly the case in Britain at the present time. Exports are, in fact, still growing at roughly the same rate as is world trade in manufactured goods. The recent export trend surveys carried out by the Confederation of British Industry all refer to the concern of exporters with rising costs at home, but their primary concern is with the lack of skilled labour which makes delivery so uncertain.

The worst aspect of the balance of payments problem is to be found on the side of imports which continue to rise despite all the efforts of the CHANCELLOR to reverse that trend. There is also the rapid growth of the Government's own expenditure overseas which has done nothing to strengthen sterling. A devaluation in such conditions would merely provide a repetition of the post-Korean upsurge of domestic prices, to be followed by a series of wage and salary demands which would make those of 1965 look modest. There is, of course, the further consideration of the consequences of devaluation for the future of the sterling area, the dollar, and the world monetary situation currently bedevilled by the dispute over international liquidity. Such issues, at least from the point of view of the U.K. economy, are subsidiary to the main case against devaluation.

The Government's policy must strike at the actual problem and this is twofold. First and more obvious, there is the balance of payments deficit due to excessive imports and Government spending overseas rather than inadequate exports. Second, there is the deplorable rate of growth in the U.K. economy arising from inadequate investment and, more especially, low productivity due in the main to the state of overfull employment and a soft inflationary domestic market. Such conditions will persist for as long as there are about three vacancies for every potential applicant for employment and for as long as every producer and distributor knows full well that any wage or salary increase can be shared between the Revenue on the one hand and the consumer on the other.

This is not to suggest, as many observers of British industry might suspect, that a dose of unemployment alone would work wonders. Simply for the Government to allow the figure of unemployment to rise to some seven hundred thousand would be disastrous. It would entrench the unions' resistance to the removal of their out-moded restrictive practices which, in all conscience, are difficult enough to remove after two decades of overfull employment. At the same time such conditions would destroy industry's incentive to press on with its plans for the long overdue technological revolution and labour-saving production methods. Such a situation would merely revive all the worst fears in the ranks of both labour and management that the country was back to the restrictive era of the 1930s.

Nevertheless it is quite clear that the Government's policy of disinflation will increase unemployment, and short-time working even more, this winter. It will also lead to the deferment of investment and a slower rate of economic growth. If this is the sum of the Government's policy, then the future is indeed depressing. The object of deflation is to re-deploy resources in such a way that the wasteful and inefficient use of labour is discouraged. That re-deployment will not be achieved merely by squeezing the employers; it must be accompanied by more generous benefits for those who have to change their jobs and, even more important, supplemented by effective schemes for the re-training of redundant workers. Nor should the squeeze be restricted solely to the private sector. It is hardly necessary to cite chapter and verse for the waste of labour in the public service, including the nationalized industries.

It is doubtful, however, if the public long accustomed to the hot-house conditions of inflationary wage and salary awards, coupled with a virtual certainty of employment regardless of capacity or effort, would willingly allow the Government to revive the chastening forces of competition. Successive sterling crises have largely left the man-in-the street unaffected; in contrast, many workers have vivid recollections of the 'bad old days'. There will be many voters who will prefer the past policy of drift towards the bottom of the international economic league rather than submit to the rigours of a competitive society, whatever the Government may do to soften the impact upon a minority of those harshly affected. Time alone will tell.

The accountancy profession is more involved in the present crisis than most. Their direct concern with the efficiency of industry and commerce enables accountants to make a direct contribution to higher efficiency and greater productivity. On the other hand, it is one thing knowing what goes on and what ought to be done to stimulate productivity; it is altogether another matter to persuade management to adopt such suggestions. It is only when sales start falling off and the threat of liquidation rears its ugly head that some boards are prepared to follow the counsel of their advisers. The next few months could provide members of the profession with more than usual opportunities for investigating inefficiency.

Finance Bill on Report

THE Report stage of the Finance Bill followed hard on the Committee stage. It was on Thursday, July 7th, that the Bill was re-published with the Committee stage amendments. The Report stage began on Tuesday, July 12th, and it was concluded in the early hours of July 14th.

The CHANCELLOR himself opened the debate with a brand new clause which gives the Inland Revenue power to make stock jobbers disgorge information about 'bond-washing' transactions; it also gives them supplementary powers to obtain information from brokers and other persons involved. The big bond-washing scandal of a few months ago is still being investigated and if the full story is to be obtained, the CHANCELLOR declared – and the Opposition conceded – then the Inland Revenue must have these powers.

Clause 23, which deals with the scope of section 415 of the Income Tax Act 1952 was further amended. Section 415 was greatly extended in scope by section 12 of the Finance Act 1965; however, the extension was found to be too wide in relation to arrangements between partners and the like and was reduced by clause 23. Then the Government found a defect in the drafting of clause 23 (3), which has now been corrected.

The Government also brought in an amendment of clause 35 which abolishes investment allowances in respect of expenditure incurred after January 16th, 1966. There was an exemption as regards expenditure incurred under a previous contract where the money was paid and the asset 'brought into use' not later than October 16th, 1966. Under the new amendment the asset need be brought into use only before January 17th, 1968, and there is no time limit on the payment of the price.

A Member wanted to know what 'brought into use' meant. The optimistic reply of the CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY is worth quoting:

"The words 'brought into use' are simple English and have no special legal definition which would detract from their ordinary English meaning. The Inspectors of Taxes will not take too narrow a view of the meaning and if as in the example put to me, a machine is being run in, that will certainly be regarded as being brought into use. I cannot think there will be any difficulty, as we have gone to the length of two years so as to cover any possible case.'

An attempt by one of the Government's supporters to temper the rigours of section 28 of the Finance Act 1960 (the omnibus anti-dividend-stripping section), was unsuccessful. He pointed out that if the Inland Revenue refused a clearance, there was no right of appeal. In rejecting the proposal, the FINANCIAL SECRETARY said that about two hundred applications a year had been made and clearances had been refused in only one-fifth of them. It may be observed, however, that the situation is nevertheless unsatisfactory. It means that the Revenue's view can only be tested after the proposed transaction has been irretrievably carried out.

Clause 40, which is the Government's attempt to check estate duty avoidance in the Ralli manner, was amended in subclause (4) to improve the layout and, to some extent, the clarity. The whole ramshackle structure of estate duty anti-avoidance is becoming absurd. What has happened in cases like the Ralli case is that beneficiaries have been saddled with trusts which cause a passing on a death when they need not have done so. It is avoidance only in a special sense if they seek to undo the mischief.

Attempts to rationalize the absurd situation about patent royalties paid by close companies to participants and their associates met with an unsympathetic reception. The Government still take the line that it is impossible to value a patent for corporation tax purposes, but that it is perfectly possible to do so for all other tax purposes.

The Government successfully opposed the motion for a new clause permitting grouping of profits for corporation tax purposes. The CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY agreed that subvention payment procedure was not as satisfactory to a group as grouping of profits would be, as adopted for profits tax. However, he said that the Government proposed to continue a study they have given to grouping problems. If grouping was to be allowed – and he did not promise it – then there would have to be an arrangement for interim payments to protect the revenue. He did promise that the Government would consult 'the interests which should be consulted before reaching our conclusions'.

We should have thought that the question of grouping was a fundamental one and that this investigation ought to have been made before the Finance Bill of 1965 was drawn up.

Institute Courses at Oxford and Brighton

TWO important courses for members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales were held over last week-end and concluded this week. The twentieth Oxford Summer Course at Christchurch and Merton College, attended by some two hundred members, ended on Monday, and the first Management Information Course to be held for members came to a successful conclusion on Wednesday at the Hotel Metropole, Brighton.

The Summer Course at Oxford brought members together to hear speakers on a variety of subjects and to take part in group discussions and informal discussion meetings. Mr R. Kirk Batzer, C.P.A., gave an interesting paper on 'The present practice and modern developments in auditing in the United States of America'; Mr F. T. Hunter, F.C.A., gave a paper on 'The co-ordination of finance and management' (the first part of which is reproduced elsewhere in this issue), and Mr L. H. Clark, F.C.A., addressed members on 'Some aspects of the corporation tax'. Two informal talks were also given, one by Mr A. F. Earle, PH.D., B.Sc., Principal of the London Graduate School of Business Studies, and the other by Mr D. W. Hooper, M.A., F.C.A., Technical Officer of the Institute, on 'Figures can be fun'. Members were divided into twelve groups for the purpose of discussion following each address and during the general discussion periods, and these meetings again proved a most valuable part of the course.

Over one hundred and eighty members attended the Management Information Course at Brighton, for which the ground was prepared by a pilot course held late last year.

Each of the four courses into which members were divided consisted of lectures, discussions and two case studies. The various addresses reviewed some of the basic concepts of financial management and the consideration of certain operational research techniques and their application. Close consideration was also given to current and future electronic data processing techniques and their impact on the provision of information for management. Finally, consideration was given to the future role of the accountant.

The speakers were drawn from some of the leading public companies and also from the membership of the Institute, and the whole course proved a successful forerunner to the regular series planned for the future.

Exploiting Copyright is a Trade

THE name of 'Noddy' is to be immortalized in the tax reports. Noddy Subsidiary Rights Co Ltd has persuaded Mr Justice Pennycuik that when it exploits the literary and artistic copyrights associated with Noddy, by granting sub-licences, it carried on a trade in the income tax sense. The Special Commissioners had held that it was an investment company to which section 262 of the Income Tax Act 1952 (automatic surtax direction), applied. It follows from Mr Justice Pennycuik's decision that the surtax directions made on the company for the years 1953-54 to 1958-59, on the footing that it was an investment company, are discharged.

The Crown's argument was that a person who supplied nothing but the use of property could not be carrying on a trade. This is a remarkable volte face. In the Salisbury House case the Crown argued that letting offices was a trade. The true point at issue here was whether something which had already been taxed under one Schedule could then be taxed under a different Schedule, which is rather different.

No one questions that a plant-hire company carries on a trade. It could well be that a property-owning company is carrying on a trade. True, the rents are normally taxed under Case VIII of Schedule D, but a Case I assessment is not entirely ruled out.

Educational Charity Refused Relief

THE Crown has successfully appealed against a Special Commissioners' decision which gave relief under section 447 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act 1952 in respect of annual payments received by an educational charity and applied for the benefit of children connected with the Metal Box Company.

The Educational Grants Association received a substantial covenant payment from that company and some four-fifths of its income went to children connected with the company. The learned judge held that this robbed the payments by the charity of the necessary public element.

The Language of Money

IN a missionary effort to spread a better understanding of accounting and financial matters, the International Labour Office has issued a 'programmed instruction' book on balance sheets<sup>1</sup>, the first of a series on various aspects of business training and management. It explains in question/answer form what a balance sheet is about; goes on to look separately at assets and liabilities and then at the balance sheet as a whole; it makes an assessment of the reliability of balance sheets not only in view of what they contain but, also, what they omit; and, finally, considers the balance sheet as a medium for measuring solvency, liquidity and profitability.

As there are 580 questions, together with another hundred odd by way of recapitulation, the inquisition is thorough and the compilers have concentrated on basic principles which apply to all balance sheets, thus avoiding the need to defer to national differences in terminology and presentation. Although the booklet is intended primarily for the uninitiated, experts will find much of interest in it and should not be put off by the apparent simplicity of the questions in the opening sentences. By the time they come to the end, their appreciation of the uses and limitations of a balance sheet will have been sharpened considerably.

The layout of the text has been so designed as to contain questions, spaces for the reader's answers and the check answers side by side on each page. The covers can be folded over so as to conceal the check answers until the questions have been attempted, a neat device which saves a lot of to-ing and fro-ing among the pages. If the International Labour Office's subsequent books maintain the standard set by this one, then the completed series should be a noteworthy contribution to the progress of business education.

Good Business Communications

THE climate of every business changes constantly with the winds which blow around it. It is vital, therefore, that management should have up-to-date facts and accurate forecasts available so that it can counteract the unfavourable winds and take advantage of those which help things along. In a book just published<sup>1</sup>, plans to supply co-operative societies with such facts and forecasts, and covering various periods from a week to a year, are described in some detail. The statistics derived therefrom form the basis of an annual operating plan which embraces the capital works programme, rolling stock and plant programmes, departmental budgets, a revenue summary and a cash flow statement. In each instance, specimen rulings accompany the explanatory text.

The records demonstrated have been taken from those originally devised and since modified over a long period of years by an actual co-operative society so that they have already been put to the practical test. Their publication, in a form readily understandable to those with a grounding in the principles of this form of trading, should be of distinct value in the constant search for stability which must be achieved before controlled expansion can safely be contemplated. The author has done his colleagues in the co-operative movement an excellent service.

Who Owns Whom?

THE latest volume of Who Owns Whom? (U.K. edition) recently published<sup>2</sup>, is again increased in size and contains 62,000 entries compared with 53,000 in the 1965 edition. This is partly accounted for by wider coverage of private companies and by the inclusion for the first time of banks, insurance companies, investment trusts and other financial institutions.

The directory is divided into four sections: section 1 lists U.K. parent and associate companies showing subsidiaries and associate companies; section 2 lists the subsidiaries and associate companies showing the parent; section 3 lists United States parent and associate companies showing U.K. subsidiary and associate companies, and section 4 lists unit trusts, setting out details of the managers and trustees.

Apart from its main purpose of recording changes in company ownership, Who Owns Whom? is a valuable and comprehensive guide for company boards, financial institutions and accountants wishing to follow through the ramifications of a group, and also for sales directors planning a systematic approach or sales drive over a wide range of industries.

The companion volume, Who Owns Whom? (Continental edition), price £9 post free, is an extremely useful source of reference to European companies. The directory lists about fifty-five thousand parent, associate and subsidiary companies. Information on the scope of the directory and its manner of compilation are set out in English, French and German.

Application for Discharge from Bankruptcy Refused

AN accountant who claims to have developed powers of healing and divination for minerals and metals was said at London Bankruptcy Court on Tuesday of last week to have acted with 'complete disregard' for the interests of his creditors.

Mr Registrar Parbury said that the picture was one of financial irresponsibility that was difficult to understand in an accountant. Applying for discharge from bankruptcy was Mr Mark Rubens, 61, of Canons Drive, Edgware, Middlesex. The application was refused.

'I think this Court would be lacking in its duty if it did not mark its displeasure of his conduct by refusing the discharge' said the Registrar.

Mr Reginald Wood, Assistant Official Receiver, said debts amounted to about £7,050. It was not expected that any distribution would be made to creditors.

Mr Rubens who went bankrupt last September had attributed his failure to debts in connection with oil divination and spiritual healing, to gross and unjustifiable extravagance, and to gambling losses.

The Registrar said that Mr Rubens had been guilty of gross misconduct. He had retained money drawn from a company of which he was joint liquidator without proper authority. He had also misapplied money entrusted to him as treasurer of a class of Masonic instruction.

Good Housing Completions

THE official housing returns for May show a rate of completions which for the first time this year exceed those of the same month in 1965. These completions are, of course, the final outcome of the houses started a year ago. The houses started in the first quarter of 1966 show a rather more dismal picture.

At 85,000 these were down by 15 per cent on the same period of 1965. This was partly due to weather conditions but even more to high interest rates. This state of affairs may, of course, be all to the good in economic terms but in political terms it is highly unwelcome. A decline in housing starts is a political weapon for the Opposition for the public is sensitive, perhaps even emotional, about the housing programme even when there has been a fall in building activity only from a very high to a high level of work.

The brunt of the fall has been taken in the private sector where builders and potential owner-occupiers alike are sensitive about the price they have to pay for financial accommodation. It remains an open question whether the demand for houses in the private sector will fall further because mortgages and bridging finance are difficult to come by.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

I WAS dictating a rather important memorandum on our future overdraft facilities when my intercom phone rang. A moment later the sales manager's voice came through in an urgent whisper: 'Jezebel herrrrself, in perrrson! Fur coats department.' His rasping accent showed his agitation.

I fancy I set an all-time record for a sprint, at once speedy but dignified, downstairs to Scotty's side, admittedly at the cost of a couple of impinged toes and impacted shoulders. The pre-arranged code word of 'Jezebel' was responsible. A shoplifter had walked into the trap.

We've suffered recently from a sudden and costly wave of shoplifting. Department after department throughout the store – dresses, millinery, fancy goods, hosiery – all have been the targets. Valuable items lying in apparently secure view one minute had disappeared the next. No clues were left; no suspicious-looking characters had dodged surreptitiously through the aisles; it was expert team-work.

However, Scotty is an expert also. With painstaking care he assembled the staffs from each raided section and sought to find a common factor. How many customers had there been, male or female, young or old, tall or short, wealthy, ostentatious, reticent, debonair? Regular shoppers or unknowns? Slowly a pattern emerged, like a verbal identikit, but with an odd negative pattern. Nobody particularly noticeable had ever been present at the time of the incident, so we had to look for somebody unostentatious – commonplace. Finally, we agreed that if Scotty gave the code word, a team of specialists would swing into immediate action.

That was where I came into it. The legal angle of shoplifting is quite tricky. A customer dropping an article into a shopping basket isn't necessarily to be accepted as being a thief. If accosted she has only to say that she's waiting for an assistant to be free, or for her husband to meet her, or that she's plenty of money in her handbag to pay the bill – and this may well be so; to prove larceny would be impossible, and the burden of incontrovertible proof would lie squarely on us. Even if she had sauntered into an adjoining department the situation would be little altered. Indeed, pouncing upon her, or what to say when one pounces, or how to exercise reasonable restraint upon her, are areas bristling with nasty implications.

However, we rehearsed our strategy carefully. No movement until just out of the store, two witnesses present, a policeman within easy reach, a definite policy on prosecution . . . 'Yon's the rrroque,' whispered Scotty. 'Braw team-work, ye ken.'

In the corner bay a nice-looking plumpish matron was about to select a short squirrel jacket, after trying on several glossy alternatives which lay scattered over chairs and fixtures. A chattering companion fussed around. The matron plumed herself before a high swivel mirror, unconscious of the vigilant eyes behind the partition, then the group finally agreed on her choice. Nearby a tired little girl in spectacles was buying a cheap fur collarette. She took her change with a shy word of thanks, picked up her shabby raincoat and walked away.

'Dinna mind the two decoy ducks; there's a pair of mink ties under that raincoat,' said the sales manager quietly. 'Split-second timing did it . . . come on.'

Later as the constable closed in, her defiance faltered and broke, but she steadfastly denied having accomplices. The decoys – the master minds against whom nothing could be proved – strolled out unquestioned. She had a husband working as a commercial traveller and two children at school, who'd hear the news that evening. It seemed such a tragic waste.

Government Assistance for British Exporters

by L. H. TRIMBY, F.C.A.

IT is now common experience for professional accountants to be asked for their advice by companies wishing to enter the export field. It is, perhaps, not so widely known that the Government, principally through the Board of Trade, offer both advice and active assistance in nearly every phase of the exercise.

The object of this article is to give professional accountants the basic information regarding sources of information appertaining to the mechanics of exporting throughout the entire operation. No attempt is made to go into detail at any point, because to do so in this rapidly changing market would not only be a waste of time but could lead to inaccurate guidance being given.

Strategy of co-operation

It seems that a vast majority of British manufacturers look to the United Kingdom for their sales and profits, and it is disquieting that the general pattern should show that 35 per cent of United Kingdom exports is attributable to seventy large companies. Many of the medium and smaller companies are doing little or nothing towards a vital, highly publicized national effort.

In January 1965, the President of the Board of Trade defined the Board's strategy, which is to help firms already exporting to do more and to encourage firms which do not at present export, but which have the potential for doing so, to make a contribution.

To this end the Government provide an impressive background of help covering many aspects of market research, advertising, publicity, selling, production and finance.

The vast export market can be regarded by the exporter either as a standby when difficulties appear at home; or as a large and potentially profitable market if he will take the trouble to find his customer, to satisfy him and to look after his interests. But he must have a good product, backed by high technical ability, expert selling techniques, immaculate attention to every detail of his work, and first-class after-sales service.

Co-operation in selling

The Board of Trade can provide an immense amount of information about the export market and much practical help. It can direct attention to the most promising markets, give advice on their exploitation and information on fiscal problems and the status of buyers. The various departments concerned are shown in the appendix to this article.

The British National Export Council, which was sponsored by the Government and by industry and which works closely with a number of Government departments, functions as a clearing house for ideas and the means whereby exports can be promoted. Associated with the Council, a number of area councils and committees for exports deal with problems appertaining to individual markets.

Trade missions

The Government, through B.N.E.C., provides financial assistance for outward and inward missions, including those to and from Common Market countries, organized on a collective basis by trade associations, chambers of commerce or similar non-trading bodies. While small groups representing specific industries are regarded as the most productive of results, any feasible suggestions for a mission will be considered by the Council, approved projects receiving a Government contribution up to 50 per cent of the basic costs of travel and accommodation.

Market research

The Export Services Branch (E.S.B.) provides information regarding the market prospects for a product, the local business conditions, the production of competitive products, and imports into the country concerned together with information on local tastes and trading methods. In a word, the preliminary research to ascertain the potential of a country is available, and much of it is provided for direct consultation by exporters in the Board of Trade's Statistics and Market Intelligence Library. This comprises a comprehensive collection of trade, production and other economic statistics of foreign and Commonwealth countries, and a rapidly growing collection of trade directories, lists of importers, catalogues and information from firms within the area, market surveys and development plans. It is freely available for public use, either by personal visit during normal office hours, by telephone or by telex. The extraction of figures from the statistical publications, for firms who do not wish to do this work themselves, is undertaken by the Foreign and Commonwealth Section of the Board's Statistics Division on payment of the cost of the staff time involved.

Should, however, a particular industry find that a field of activity could profitably be made the subject of a special research project outside Government sources, then a case may be presented to B.N.E.C. through its trade association. For approved projects, Government financial assistance is given for 50 per cent of the costs of travel and accommodation where the project is undertaken by the sponsoring organization itself; where a professional consultant or other outside agency is employed by the sponsoring organization, 50 per cent of the fee for the professional services may also be refunded.

However, for individual cases, the Board of Trade cannot undertake special detailed surveys, although it will give the exporter guidance on the market research practitioners who may be able to help him.

The B.N.E.C. also administer a scheme for providing financial assistance toward the cost of producing and distributing trade directories and buyers' guides in foreign languages. As with the trade missions scheme, the assistance is offered to non-trading bodies working on a collective basis rather than to individual firms.

Market information

The Board of Trades' Export Service Bulletin gives market information under five main heads:

- (a) calls for tenders overseas: contracts put out to tender by Governments and other public bodies including advance information on openings such as new public buildings, bridges, hospitals, etc;
- (b) export opportunities: particulars of buyers seeking British suppliers and for opportunities to represent British firms in export markets;
- (c) market reports: prospects for particular goods in specified areas;
- (d) market pointers: developments overseas which may lead to exports;
- (e) Economic News: a quarterly supplement covering the business climate overseas. (Subscription rate for the Bulletin and the quarterly supplement is ten guineas per annum, available direct from the Export Services Branch, Board of Trade, Hillgate House, 35 Old Bailey, London EC4.)

The Board of Trade Journal is also a valuable source of background information supplying particularly useful statistical information, including a monthly index of wholesale prices. (Subscription rate: £5 6s 8d per annum from H.M.S.O. and Government Bookshops.) A booklet series Hints to Business Men obtainable from E.S.B. gives basic information on trading conditions throughout the world.

Statistics and samples

E.S.B. can give the fullest information ranging from customs duties, imports licences and quota arrangements to regulations governing certificates of origin, consular invoices and fees, trade and merchandise marks, and the import of samples into the market in which the exporter is interested.

E.S.B. will provide for a small fee samples of merchandise so that the exporter may be able to assess the kind of article being sold in the market in which he is interested.

Advertising and trade fairs

In January 1965 the President of the Board of Trade announced that the Government proposed substantially to increase its support for overseas trade fairs, British weeks and store promotions.

A programme of overseas trade promotions supported by the Board of Trade is published at four-monthly intervals in the Board of Trade Journal, together with a list of overseas trade fairs organized throughout the world. Information about these events and how to take advantage of them may be obtained from the Overseas Trade Fairs and the British Weeks and Store Promotions Directorates.

Under the joint venture scheme, the Board of Trade provides free space and stands for groups of British firms, sponsored by a trade association exhibiting at overseas trade fairs. Assistance in a different form is given to British firms at some general trade fairs where British pavilions are organized, mainly at events outside Western Europe; trade information stands are organized at some major events in Western Europe. From time to time, the Board of Trade provides financial support for all-British trade fairs which are organized as major events for a concentrated attack on selected markets.

The Board of Trade is responsible for the production of major British weeks overseas, and for the support and encouragement of minor (self-generated) British weeks and British promotions in department stores. The object of them all is to promote the sale overseas of British consumer goods in a particularly favourable atmosphere.

Under the co-operative advertising scheme, assistance is given to firms for group advertising when participating in any overseas promotion supported by the Board of Trade; and free publicity for British firms in the local Press would be arranged by the appropriate official British commercial representative overseas.

Publicity

Editorial publicity in newspapers and periodicals abroad, and publicity on radio and television can be achieved through the services of the Central Office of Information. When individuals or missions intend visiting a country on a promotion tour, the object of their visit may be publicized by supplying photographs and news stories of themselves and their products to C.O.I. in time for them to be used abroad just prior to their arrival.

The B.B.C. External Services can also obtain valuable publicity on radio overseas.

Frequently the most effective publicity is that arranged locally through agents, guidance on whose selection is available from the commercial representative concerned. A most important feature of publicity is the design of packaging, on which excellent advice is available from E.S.B.

Agents

The Government's official commercial representatives overseas, who are highly trained in the needs and demands of the exporter, can provide advice on markets, assist with publicity, give introductions to agents deemed suitable to the exporters' requirements, and advise on the rate of commission which he should be paid.

As experienced firms will know, there is no substitute for personal contact with agents and buyers in the export market. Through intelligence gleaned by the commercial representative, E.S.B. can direct the exporter to the most interesting markets for his products, have introductions obtained for him, appointments arranged and other local information collected for him before his arrival. The entire itinerary can be planned in conjunction with E.S.B. to produce the best results for the least expense.

Status of foreign traders

Information on the credit-worthiness and financial standing of foreign traders can be obtained from specialist agencies or by policy-holders from the Export Credits Guarantee Department (E.C.G.D.) who possess the largest dossiers in the United Kingdom on the standing of foreign buyers; information concerning their reputation, activities, organization and management are available, which can if need arises be augmented by direct reference to the local commercial representative.

Export finance

The E.C.G.D. will, in suitable cases, provide direct bank guarantees enabling finance to be obtained from the bank at a favourable rate in addition to the exporters' normal overdraft facilities. Since March 1966 contracts for manufactures of all kinds for which two years' credit or longer has been approved by E.C.G.D. have been eligible for such a guarantee, facilitating finance from the financing bank at a fixed interest rate of  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. For contracts with credit terms from thirty days to two years, a revolving bank guarantee issued in conjunction with an exporter's whole turnover guarantee is available against which an exporter may obtain finance at Bank rate by presenting bills of exchange or promissory notes.

Credit insurance

The E.C.G.D., whose business covers 27 per cent of the entire export trade, provides cover for British exporters against major financial risks in trading with foreign markets. Typical of such risks are: insolvency or protracted default of the buyer; foreign Government action which prevents or delays payment; imposition of new importing licensing restrictions – for example, those applied to textiles a few years ago; cancellation of a valid import licence into a country; a British export licence cancelled or not renewed; any other cause of loss outside Britain and not within the control of the exporter or the foreign buyer and not normally insurable with commercial insurers.

The object of the scheme is not only to cover actual losses arising from the causes outlined above, but also to enable the exporter to offer competitive credit terms to the foreign buyer, particularly where he is a new customer. Thus the scheme is essentially one of insurance and not a means whereby the seller can pass poor market risks to a third party.

In June 1965, premium rates were cut by 10 per cent and in May 1966 a further cut averaging 15 per cent was made. The Department, which will not join in cover with a private insurance company, requires a fair spread of the exporter's business and will supply full details of the guarantees offered.

As the exporter is invariably required by his banker to obtain E.C.G.D. clearance before overdraft facilities for export purposes will be granted to him, he will be well advised to ensure that the credit terms offered to, and the scope of his contract with, the buyer are covered by E.C.G.D. before committing himself to it.

To those exporters who prefer to leave debt collection overseas to the British factoring system now well established in the City, particulars of recommended factors can be obtained from E.S.B.

Disputes

The exporter who becomes involved in a contractual dispute is well advised to refer the matter in the first instance to the E.S.B. The commercial representative of the Embassy or High Commission in the country concerned can then examine the matter on the spot and frequently bring about a speedy solution without need for recourse to law.

Import relief and export rebates

The exporter who incorporates imported parts of material into his product should apply to the local Customs Officer to get back, as drawback, the import duty he has had to pay on those imported goods. Where classes of goods are not already eligible for drawback, he should apply to the Board of Trade for the introduction of drawback arrangements to cover them, if he can show that the import duty he has had to bear on materials included in them are forcing him to charge prices which result in his market potential being restricted.

Particulars of the export rebate scheme, which is designed to relieve exporters of the burden of certain indirect taxes (viz: hydrocarbon oil duty, motor vehicle duty, and some elements of purchase tax) which enter into the cost of production of exported goods, may be had from the local Customs Officer (Notices No. 436 and 435 by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise: Export Rebates).

Cost reduction contribution

An important contribution towards reducing costs of production is offered by the Distribution of Industry Division of the Board of Trade, who can assist with advice on factory site availability, labour and transport conditions in development areas; and with grants and loans attaching to the scheme.

Securing finance

While it will be appreciated from the measures outlined above that temporary short-term finance is available to support an export drive employing existing assets, it is unlikely that banks will be willing to grant hard-core overdrafts resulting from a semi-permanent state of over-trading with the export market – a feature which is not uncommon where the smaller business finds itself caught up in the demands of a market considerably larger than anything of which it has previous experience. At this point there are two institutions which may be able to help: The Industrial & Commercial Finance Corporation Limited and The National Research Development Corporation.

The I.C.F.C., of which the Bank of England is one of the shareholding banks, was set up in 1945 to assist small- and medium-sized companies requiring long-term loan capital or share capital, which do not find it practicable or convenient to raise by way of banking facilities or a public issue.

The N.R.D.C. was set up in 1949 to develop and exploit, in the public interest, inventions resulting from research carried out by Government departments and other public bodies or from any source where, in the Corporation's view, the public interest requires it. The Corporation, which has supported the electronic computer industry since 1949, hovercraft and fuel cells, is well placed to assist the exporter with such development problems.

Alternatively, if he does not contemplate exporting the physical article himself, he can negotiate his technical knowledge to the foreign manufacturer on a royalty basis and sell his production rights to foreign licensees to whom he can be introduced by the Board of Trade.

Conclusion

It will be apparent from the outline given above that every possible encouragement is being given by Government departments to exporters. The one serious obstacle which remains is to induce firms that do not at present export, to do so; to take advantage of the facilities available, and to start a drive for foreign markets. Such firms frequently complain that they meet insurmountable competition if they export overseas at realistic prices; while, if they lower prices, the exercise becomes unprofitable.

There are two possible explanations for this state of affairs:

- (1) that the firm's organization and methods are insufficiently up to date to ensure the maximum profitability, to which the answer may be to employ consultants to make a survey and report, as was done in the case of I.C.I. and Shell.

- (2) that the firm's management accounting methods are out of date and failing to produce reliable forecasts of the marginal profits which will result from selling overseas. The techniques of marginal costing are the only reliable yardstick in this field and are too little used in Britain. These, coupled with the day-to-day management information which can be produced as a result of committing accountancy problems to a computer, may well show the decisive contribution which can be made to profits as a result of breaking into the export market.

If the exporter will approach the National Economic Development Council through his trade association, he will be introduced to the consultants best placed to help him surmount these problems. Having done so there is no reason why the smallest manufacturer should not make a contribution to the national export drive. The Government will give him powerful help, but in the last analysis only the exporter himself can go to it with a will.

The Co-ordination of Finance and Management – I

by F. T. HUNTER, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A., M.I.M.C.

I. Introduction

It is nowadays no longer thought to be true that management and finance are things apart. It never was true but was at one time thought to be so, and finance was not recognized as an integral part of management. To talk of co-ordinating finance and management is, as is mentioned again later, almost an absurdity. How can there be any sane management without finance? The co-ordination is part and parcel of management and any manager, no matter what his particular expertise may be, has managerial interests in all other expertises. The production director has interests in finance. The finance director has interests in production. The sales director has interests in research. The research director has interests in sales, and so on. Each has an interest in and effect upon the other. One cannot work without the other. The object of any business is to make, indeed to maximize, profits and to do this effectively demands co-ordination of and by all. But in 1966 one ought not to have to say it, nor ought papers need to be written about it. It should be a fact of life like breathing. But it isn't.

2. It is, however, very common when thinking about co-ordinating finance and management to allow one's thoughts to stray sideways a little and to think about a technique called 'responsibility accounting', and to delude oneself into a belief that that is what one means.

Responsibility accounting is a form of presentation of control information (whether at budget or actual stage) which endeavours to present separately a picture of the sphere of influence of each individual executive, at all levels from the managing director to foreman or lower.

3. This is by no means always possible. However, this technique will be referred to again later in this paper. Suffice to say here that it is not co-ordination of finance and management.

4. Managements invest money in buildings, plant, patents, debtors, stocks of raw material, subsidiary companies (which are buildings, plant, patents, etc.), and sometimes mere castles in the air. These are the fixed and floating assets which make up the going concern.

5. Managements spend day by day money on wages, clerks, light, power, maintenance, and many other things, all the daily, weekly, monthly expenditures which go to making the saleable product. They are the expenses needed to make the fixed and floating assets work and end as a finished part cost or a finished product cost in the finished store.

6. Managements earn money from sales. Part of these sale proceeds is the sum of money called working capital, endlessly (it is hoped) working its way round the circle, cash – expense – cost – work in progress – finished cost – sale – debtors – cash. But all managements endeavour to see that more comes in than goes out and that part of the sale proceeds is profit which goes some way at least towards financing expansion, new plant, research, and anything else that is required to maintain a forward-moving policy, and dividends (contrary to popular belief these are the shot-in-the-arm. Without them there is no investment other than State investment).

7. Management uses money in various ways, but if the business is a healthy one management creates money as well, so far as itself is concerned.

Money is finance, and it is the husbanding of this finance that ought to be meant when talking about co-ordinating finance and management. Finance has to be there when required, to a date and to a precise amount, it has to be used economically and it should be used for the most worthwhile purposes at any one time. What is right today may not be what is right tomorrow, but today and tomorrow both have to be catered for if possible.

The finance must be used for its planned purpose, or if there is a change it must be a planned change.

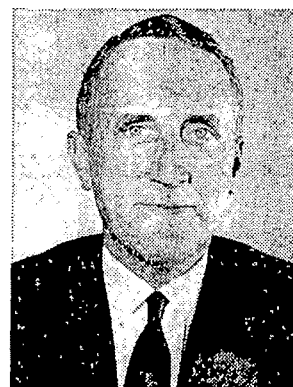

8. Every now and then someone does a study of company failures and endeavours to find out why they did fail. Depressingly often, the answer is that worth-while enterprises fail very early in their life because finances were not controlled and were wasted, or progress was too rapid and the enterprise ran out of working capital. Like riding a surf-board on Bondi Beach, the pace is breathtakingly exciting, but progress can also become dangerous and short-lived.

9. A regular perusal of The Financial Times demonstrates, however, that some of the long-term giants also tangle up their finances horribly. The cold analysis afterwards in the paper is, perhaps, a little easy but it does make one wonder sometimes what does go on in some boardrooms.

Mr F. T. Hunter, the author of this paper presented on Friday of last week at the Oxford Summer Course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, is a partner in Robson, Morrow & Co, of London. He was admitted to membership of the Institute in 1932.

10. If this is true, and it clearly is, of the published concerns, what about the thousands of unpublished enterprises pottering along in a gentlemanly but somewhat bewildered sort of way with the owners (often the family relics) enjoying a steadily declining standard of life.

All too often no amount of co-ordinating finance and management stands a chance here as there is no management to co-ordinate.

II. Size of the enterprise is a factor

11. It is probably true that the smaller enterprises are more vulnerable than the larger, and that the finances of the smaller enterprise are more frequently stretched almost to breaking point.

12. This is a somewhat sweeping generalization probably not capable of real proof or disproof without much research, but it is a general impression that is widely accepted.

It is possible to think of many reasons why it should be so. New enterprises growing rapidly and struggling to burst out of the confining bonds of small funds, inability to create large reserves to carry over the depressions, inability to command ready loans for plant and technological expansion, reluctance of suppliers to extend any long credit to brash newcomers; one can think of many more.

13. It means that the smaller enterprises almost certainly have to nurture their finances more closely and carefully than many of the giants or medium-sized concerns.

14. This is no argument at all that the larger enterprises do not need to nurture their finances closely and carefully. They have to do just that, but size usually argues larger funds, and larger funds enable more to be done and without sometimes quite so much anxiety. The smaller concern spends more time performing on the tightrope and less bowing to the enthusiastic audience.

15. In the smaller concern co-ordination of finance and management is almost always an ever-present 'must'. Large concerns can coast along on an inbuilt momentum for a very long time without much real management, and now and then an example hits the headlines to the amazement of one and all. But small concerns can seldom do this. The momentum is much less and the bailiffs appear on the scene much sooner.

III. Is finance part of management?

16. Not so very long ago many would have argued that finance and financial control were not part of management at all. To them management consisted of the people who designed, made, and sold the products. Indeed, even those who designed were not always included.

17. Finance was a nuisance albeit a necessary nuisance, but it created nothing, and contributed nothing. Everything it did was historic and the function was a humdrum one of recording. No matter whether it was wages, invoicing, paying suppliers, or preparing a profit and loss account (this was almost a sacred rite often performed by the managing director himself), it was recording the result (and result only) of the efforts of others.

18. Gradually at first and then at a vastly increased pace, business grew both in size and complexity. Horizons widened and the world became in effect smaller. Recording no longer was enough and managements began to demand something more. Often they did not know what they wanted but were only clear that whenever it was they were not getting it.

19. Accountants responded, at times perhaps a little slowly, but over the last thirty years or so have made almost astonishing strides. There is still some criticism that enough accountants are not spending enough time looking ahead, and spend too much time on sterile things like annual audits. But this is an easy criticism to make. Are annual audits all that worthless?

20. Perhaps what is meant is that audits as largely carried out at present are not very helpful. This is not the same thing at all, and there are in fact ample pieces of evidence of the performance today of a very different type of audit from that performed even only fifteen years ago, at least by the larger firms of public accountants.

21. A result of the response from accountants has been that finance has very definitely become part of management, and the problem is to knit it into the management structure neatly and tidily. Also part of the problem still is to gain acceptance in some quarters of the accountant as something more than a recorder. It should not be thought that this acceptance has taken place already to such an extent as to no longer rouse argument or surprise. No one questions the role of the works manager as part of management but many still question the role of the accountant as part of it. He is part of it willy-nilly today but has a hard time very often preventing himself from being elbowed out.

22. The absurd part of the whole conflict is that the need by functional management for financial management is there, and if accountants had not provided the necessary service and expertise someone else would have to have done so. It can be argued that there are other approaches, that of the economist for example, but none of these arguments make any difference to the fact that finance is a vital part of management today however it is approached and controlled, and no business reaches the peak and stays there unless it recognizes the truth of this, and acts upon such recognition. However, to avoid confusion the word management in this paper has been used to mean all aspects of management other than finance which is described as such.

IV. The organization

23. Any enterprise must have organization. This does not necessitate a beautiful three-colour chart with neat boxes, solid and hatched lines, titles and seniorities. These may be absolutely necessary in a large complex organization that needs putting on paper for two reasons:

- (a) to see if it looks sensible, is comprehensive and has a hope of working,
- (b) so that everyone who cares to read it can understand where he fits in, and where the other man fits in.

24. But there are many hundreds of enterprises where the organization is not on paper but is well understood by everyone and works perfectly. Equally there are many hundreds of enterprises where the official organization, whether on paper or not, is almost lunatic, but it functions because the executives have worked out the short cuts and operating routines to make it work. In these cases, of course, the real organization is not the official one at all.

25. Both of these latter examples demand a high degree of co-operation from the executives, and much of this exists often because there is a small closely-knit group who have learnt to get on and not quarrel. It is probably true that the larger the whole organization becomes the more is there a need to spell it out on paper because the small groups of congenial people that will be formed tend to of themselves be less powerful parts of the whole, and it is necessary to legislate for the knitting together of these small groups, whereas in the small organization the small groups (who will tend in fact to be individuals) will knit themselves together.

26. But if a well-knit enterprise is the aim, an organization there must be, and it is not possible to co-ordinate anything, let alone finance and management, without one.

27. A point often overlooked in thinking about management is that much of the organization very often exists simply and solely because of finance. Because finance has become an integral and essential part of management it has demanded an organization of its own to enable it to function properly. Any well-set-up finance department will have executives and staff to carry out the functions of book-keeping, budgeting, controlling and costing and will probably include wages, salaries, and a few other not so noticeable accounting functions. But not so long ago this would not have been so.

28. If the wider international aspects of modern financial management are considered there will be seen to be an enormous amount of manpower and management structure created by and devoted to the need to manage money. Without this management of money on a national and international scale modern industry and commerce would not be possible.

29. The old idea that management were the 'doers', the makers and sellers, and finance was something you had to have for several reasons, some legislative and some optional, has clearly been overtaken by events. Finance is part of management today but there is still all too often a problem in making the separate parts of management work together. They have conflicting interests, conflicting pressures and regrettably sometimes deep suspicions. To be a purist one could argue that saying 'co-ordination of finance and management' is really saying, 'co-ordination of management and management', but this would appear to deny that there are co-ordination problems and this would not be true.

V. Management interrelationships

30. The interrelationships in any management structure are seldom simple. They are almost always somewhat complex, and the complexity is not always just because the business is complex. Much of the complexity is created in a sense unnecessarily because it stems from the people involved and not from anything inherent in the business.

31. Any organization can usually be put down on a chart and moulded until it is sensible, is comprehensive, and will work theoretically. But the one thing which it is very difficult if not impossible to put on the chart is whether A, who according to the chart has a direct relationship or liaison with B, will in fact work harmoniously with him.

32. When the theoretical chart is settled is often when the compromising has to start, and be written into the chart. It is easy to say that A is awkward and must be removed, but A may have some expertise, or value of some kind, that outweighs his awkwardness, and the organization is 'bent' a little to fit him in, and enable him to work without either upsetting himself or his colleagues too much.

33. The relationships are particularly difficult sometimes between finance and the other parts of management. Why is this? Largely because finance is a restraining discipline, and also an inquiring discipline. It says 'No' and it also asks 'Why'. Neither of these is always calculated to make for harmony. In the eyes of the rest of management the finance department sits and criticizes but doesn't do anything creative.

34. Functional management spends. It has to spend to perform its tasks of designing, making and selling. But there is a need to control this spending, both in quantity to keep within the resources available, and in direction to see that the best use is made of them. Finance does this and is a constant irritation thereby.

35. Functional management knows all this fundamentally but would seldom say so. It prefers to continue to blame finance bitterly for parsimonious petty restrictions because it does not want to acknowledge perhaps even to itself the bitter disappointment of a pet scheme foundering for lack of funds, or lack of sufficient profit content.

36. The chief of finance (whatever his title) needs to be thick-skinned, calm, always factually correct, and above all a honey-tongued diplomat. If he expresses opinions, as he must, he should do so in a pleasant non-aggressive way — any hint of big brother having spoken and he gets nowhere. Friction and lack of co-ordination can just as easily be created by lack of tact from finance as by mulishness on the shop floor.

37. Business is a conflict inevitably. Conflicting interests pull sections of management apart and almost force them to take stands. Having taken a stand individuals don't like abandoning it. The skill of the managing director is in gently easing the individuals off their stands and preventing the conflicts becoming crises. There are usually alternative courses of action in any situation but finance won't always allow unfettered choice. This is where the co-ordination is vital.

38. Some businesses are inherently prone to crises. The hotel industry is perhaps a good example where the enterprise leaps daily from crisis to crisis. This is not apparent to the guests but you don't have to spend much time behind the scenes to become aware of the crisis. Here the skill is in preventing the crisis becoming a disaster.

39. Management does not mean the same thing to everyone. Each executive would give a different definition, and each executive would have a view of his own function and influence both in itself and in its relation to the others very different from the view held by the other executives, both about themselves and the others. It is not at all uncommon to find widely differing views of the sphere of influence of any one executive.

40. To co-ordinate finance and management, or to co-ordinate management as a whole into a reasonably well-operating unit demands that every executive be made to realize that the other man can have a point of view, and that what each does has a considerable influence on what the other does. Not only is there the influence on each other but there is the need for all to be, so far as possible, striving for the same end and to have a common influence on the attainment of the end-result. This sounds a classic glimpse of the obvious but there are many businesses where the executives are by no means all striving for the same thing. Indeed, it is not unknown to find executives in the same enterprise who are not at all clear what the object really is.

VI. Forms of capital

41. Before considering methods of co-ordination and control it would be useful probably to think for a moment of just what is being controlled and co-ordinated.

The late T. G. Rose, in his admirable book The Internal Finance of Industrial Undertakings, sets it out very clearly and precisely.

42. First there is the total capital employed. This is an easy one and is the total of the assets side of the balance sheet, less fictitious assets such as losses or expenditures which have no value but cannot for the moment be written off. Rose points out that this is not a static figure but can fluctuate sometimes quite rapidly. Think of the fluctuations in stocks, or the growth of debtors.

43. The total capital divides into two main categories and Rose emphasizes that there are only two, fixed capital and circulating capital.

The fixed capital is the money invested in fixed assets, and this money tends to stay unaffected until an asset is sold or otherwise disposed of. It follows that once the decision to invest in a fixed asset is implemented, the control upon it is not so searching or frequent as the day-to-day control required for the circulating capital.

44. The circulating capital is the money in circulation in the form of wages, materials, work in progress, overheads, finished stocks, debtors and investments. This is not the place to discuss whether there is a difference between circulating capital and working capital. In some definitions there is, but for all practical purposes for this paper it can be assumed that they are virtually the same thing.

45. One of the very important points that Rose emphasizes, and which is so often overlooked, is what he calls the 'time-period variation'. A simple example of what he means is the payment of wages. This has to take place every week but the time elapsed before the money comes back again in the form of sale proceeds can vary from two weeks to two years. Such situations have a marked effect on the amount of working capital required.

46. Circulating capital (or otherwise called current assets) is made up of some fully liquid assets such as cash, marketable securities, debtors, and of some working assets (which can rapidly become liquid assets) such as finished stocks, and work in progress.

Fixed capital is made up of tangible assets such as buildings and plant, intangible assets such as goodwill, or research expenditure, and fictitious assets such as past losses or any expenditure not yet written off such as royalty payments, long-term advertising or something of that sort.

47. The principal concern of the financial controller lies, perhaps, in two concepts:

- (a) The enterprise should earn such a return on the capital employed as makes it potentially at least better than investing the money in someone else's business or in gilt-edged.
- (b) The enterprise should maintain funds in a sufficiently liquid form to enable normal commercial terms of trading to be observed, and to have a margin of safety. No business can operate all the time on the brink of disaster, though many seem to try. The moment the normal terms of trading cannot be maintained over-trading has started and if continued there is one inevitable and unpleasant result.

48. One of the figures the financial controller will calculate at regular intervals is what is called net worth. This is the total of the issued share capital, any general reserves, and the unallocated balance on profit and loss account. In other words it is what the shareholders would get on a break-up, assuming that balance sheet values were realistic. It is a very important figure and indicates health or illness.

49. But this paper is not really concerned with exactly this aspect. It is concerned with how the financial controller goes about the task of maintaining financial sanity, which usually would have the result of maintaining net worth.

50. It was very unpopular to say 'profit motive'. Indeed, it was almost subversive though some surprising people seem to be having some change of heart recently. But unless a financial controller has firmly in his mind that one of the reasons his enterprise is in business is to make a profit (and let's nail the flag firmly to the mast, a thumping big one if possible), he will take wrong decisions and will do wrong things. The whole of the financial planning must be that more comes in than goes out, and in sufficiently large amounts to pay for expansion, if for nothing else.

Mr J. N. R. Barker, of A.E.I., at the B.I.M. conference in March 1966 said: 'A few years ago the word profit was almost indecent but now, perhaps as a sign of our progress you may think, it seems to have lost much of its coarseness and we can say without a blush that the prime reason we are in business is to make money.'

51. In recent years there has been a change in the financial make-up of many businesses. The ratio of fixed and variable expense has moved towards fixed and the fixed percentage has become much more significant. E. F. L. Brech in his book The Principles and Practice of Management says that one of the major factors in this is the increase in automation and mechanization generally.

Businesses have been forced as a result to pay much more attention to maintaining volume of turnover at a satisfactory level because the break-even point has moved up, and the margin of safety, the difference between cost and selling price has narrowed.

52 One of the results has been the urge to diversify, and to spread the funds more widely to avoid being caught quite so badly if there is a slump in one trade. There have doubtless been some ludicrous examples of diversification but one result has been that financial controllers became faced with problems of unfamiliar industries, and problems of how to present some sort of coherent and balanced picture to a parent board of a number of quite dissimilar businesses.

53. It is fairly clear that the co-ordination procedures within any one enterprise, and within any group, will differ according to the type of capital being considered. Long-term plans for investment in fixed assets will be discussed at a different level and with different people than will be involved in discussions about the production programme for the next three months. All go to make up the whole and are part of the general operating plans, both long- and short-term, but each have their own factors and problems.

VII. Forms of control

54. It is also fairly evident that the form of control for one aspect of management, or for one set of circumstances, is not the same necessarily as for another. It is not, perhaps, quite so evident that the control does not have to be something written on a piece of paper, or be made the subject of a report to someone.

Brech in The Principles and Practice of Management lists the forms of control as:

Visual – examples are:

- (i) just walking round and looking;
- (ii) reading a dial and acting if necessary on what it says.

Measurement and comparison (control by exception)

This form of control involves 'frequent measurement and evaluation of actual progress', and thereafter comparing what has been done or achieved with what it was planned should be done or achieved. This is the basic approach of budgetary control, and the management only need to take note of and act upon anything that shows an exception from the expectation. This form of control can be, and is, used for physical events, e.g. volumes of production, as well as for financial events. All financial events are the result of physical events except for the pure rate of spending (buying an article at 5s when budgeted to spend only 2s 6d), but the physical control is often used first (daily production statistics for example) and the financial aspect follows at a later date such as a period end.

Pre-control

This form of control is closely akin to what is now known as commitment accounting, which is in simple terms planning what it is intended to do and then controlling the resulting spending commitment to see that excesses do not creep in. The construction industry is a perfect example. Who has set out to build a house and paid the price first thought of? It is as Brech says, much better to deal with cost reductions before the event because no amount of control after the commitment reduces the costs, and this is undoubtedly true.

Motivation

Brech says that 'no method of control will prove effective unless the firms' employees are motivated in some way to achieve good results'. Few would probably quarrel with this. Experience seems to show that merely telling people to do this or do that is not very rewarding. Everyone (at least everyone who can be called a manager) should have a say in budgeting, and should receive control reports. Brech also points out that a slack uninterested management rapidly results in poor and slow effort generally and blames much of the early disillusionment with budgetary control on lack of attention to motivation.

Ad hoc

Always there will be unexpected incidents. Some are far-reaching, some are immediate and once-only. Whatever they are, decisions have to be made then and there, and may well represent additions to, deletions from, or rearrangements of existing plans. The daily crises in the hotel industry are good examples.

55. In co-ordinating finance and management the controls under the headings of measurement and comparison, and pre-control are probably the most often used. The visual controls will tend to be used to keep events in line with plan, and would less often lead to rearrangements of plan and, as a result, perhaps of finance. The effect of visual controls may well appear in a period control statement in money terms in the form of a variance but the visual control itself is much more a constant prevention of wrong things happening. Measurement and comparison and pre-control overlap and it is not easy to say where one ends and the other begins. Ad hoc controls often will involve budgets and subsequently reports. The control mechanism would come under the measurement and comparison heading. The ad hoc control crystallizes a plan to deal with a situation, and thereafter any routine control stemming therefrom becomes part of the general routine.

56. Motivation is very important. It is a word which is not acceptable to all by any means, and has too much of the psychoanalyst's couch about it for many. But whether it is called this or something else the basic concept that the managers at all levels must be made to feel that they are part of not only the control itself but of the plan that is being controlled is undoubtedly sound. That hackneyed over-worked expression 'they must feel that they belong' has considerable force, and it is undoubtedly also true that people stay in not so rewarding or indeed so comfortable occupations because they do feel a real part of them and can identify themselves (to use another hackneyed phrase) fully with the position and the enterprise. They also need to be treated as human beings. This can be so over-done as to be laughable but people should never be treated as cattle.

Memorandum to the Chancellor of the Exchequer from The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales

The Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the following comments which arise on a preliminary consideration of the Finance Bill 1966 at present before Parliament. The Council has also included at the end of the document reference to outstanding matters, previously submitted in connection with the Finance Act 1965, which it considers merit urgent consideration in relation to the Finance Bill 1966.

[The memorandum is published as part of the proceedings of the meeting of the Council held on July 6th, reported in The Accountant last week.]

INTRODUCTORY

THE Council urges that explanatory notes should be published with Finance Bills. The present Bill, particularly in relation to its amending sections, is complicated and the task of taxpayers and their advisers would have been eased considerably by the issue of notes.

PART II – INCOME TAX

Clause 21 – Surtax on income under certain settlements: exceptions to section 415 (1), Income Tax Act 1952

2. Clause 21 is proposed in substitution for section 12 (3) of the Finance Act 1965, to be effective for the year 1965–66 as well as for later years of assessment. Section 12 (3), as has been previously pointed out, was drafted in such a way that it would have caused hardship to members of successor partnerships paying bona fide retirement annuities to former members (or their dependants) of predecessor partnerships with whom they had not themselves been in actual partnership. Payments made in those circumstances would have been treated for surtax purposes as income of the payers. The Council welcomes clause 21 in so far as it remedies the difficulties complained of and seeks confirmation, having regard to sub-clause (3), that this is its intention and effect.

Clause 22 – Dividend increases etc. in 1965–66: exclusion of surtax relief under section 238 of Act of 1952

3. The Council deplores the retrospective penalizing of the recipients of dividend income. The great majority of cases for relief will have arisen where the shareholder had no say in the dividend distribution of the company concerned, and where in addition the company was merely paying up to the standard permitted by the Finance Act 1965.

Clause 23 – Directors and employees of companies granted rights to acquire shares

4. It is submitted that provision should be made for any gain on the exercise of the option to be spread, at the taxpayer's election, over the period from the date of grant to the date of exercise assignment or release of the option, such spreading to be limited to say five years.

PART III – CORPORATION TAX ACTS

Clause 26 – Dividends paid out of pre-1966–67 profits: groups of companies

5. It is understood from this clause that where a company pays a dividend between April 6th, 1966, and May 3rd, 1966, it may use sufficient one-year surplus to cover that dividend whether the one-year surplus was calculated by reference to dividends received from subsidiaries of that company or not. To the extent that one-year surplus is calculated by reference to dividends received from subsidiaries or companies within the same group it is not available to cover dividends paid in 1966–67 otherwise than before May 3rd, 1966. Sub-clause (3) states that a dividend shall be regarded as having been paid before May 3rd, 1966, in certain circumstances. Section 83 of the Finance Act 1965 states that a company resident in the United Kingdom which pays a gross amount in dividends greater than its standard will be treated as if the excess were the gross amount of dividends paid by the company on the first day of the year 1966–67 and brought into account under sections 47 (3) and 48 of the Finance Act 1965. Confirmation is therefore sought, by reference to clause 26, that such excess dividends which would have been covered by the one-year surplus under the provisions of the Finance Act 1965 will remain covered under sub-clause (2) as dividends paid on April 6th 1966.

Clause 31 – Transitory provisions for double taxation agreements having retrospective effect

6. The Council seeks an assurance that the retrospective effect of any double taxation agreement will not be harmful to any taxpayer.

PART IV – INCOME TAX AND CORPORATION TAX*Clause 33 – Abolition of investment allowances and amendments as to initial allowances

7. Clause 33 (2) broadly continues the grant of investment allowances in respect of assets under a contract in force at January 16th, 1966, provided that payment is made and the asset brought into use not later than October 16th, 1966. It is considered that this nine months' period, particularly in respect of hire-purchase (maximum period three years), long-term building contracts and ships, is too short for the completion of payment and the bringing into use of the asset. It is therefore submitted that the date 'October 16th, 1966' at the end of the sub-clause should be amended to 'January 16th, 1969, or such later date as the Commissioners may decide where the person claiming the investment allowance shows either that there has been unavoidable delay in completion of the contract or that the contract is in respect of a construction project or ship for which the period would normally be in excess of three years'.

Clause 35 – Vehicles which are to be eligible for initial allowances

8. Clause 35 brings in for initial allowance vehicles of a construction primarily suited for the conveyance of goods thereby rectifying an anomaly resulting from the operation of section 13 (1) of the Finance Act 1965. It is therefore submitted that clause 35 (2) should be made effective from April 6th, 1965, and not January 16th, 1966.

Clause 37 – Cancellation of tax advantages from certain transactions in securities

9. Clause 37 (2) provides that an assessment under section 28 (3) of the Finance Act, 1960, made on a person other than the company, may be of an amount arrived at without regard to any set-off to which the company would have been entitled under Schedule 12, Finance Act 1965. It is submitted that the assessment should take into account only the net tax which has been avoided.

10. Clause 37 (6) defines 'non-taxable', in relation to a person receiving consideration, as meaning that the recipient does not pay or bear tax on it as income (apart from section 28, Finance Act, 1960). Assurance is sought that, in arriving at the amount assessable under section 28, Finance Act 1965, in no case will income tax and capital gains tax be charged on the same receipt.

SCHEDULES*Schedule 4 – Amendments of Corporation Tax Acts*Paragraph 1 – Payments without deduction of income tax: trading companies owned through a holding company

11. Paragraph 1 (1) refers to 90 per cent subsidiaries and paragraph 1 (2) provides that to qualify under the above paragraph the share capital of such subsidiaries must be directly owned by the other company. It is submitted that reference should be made to indirect ownership or alternatively that the word 'directly' in line 20 should be deleted.

12. Assurance is sought that in line 12 of paragraph 1 (1) the use of the plural 'companies' includes the singular.

Paragraph 2 – Payments by parent company to subsidiary

13. The Council seeks assurance that a further notice of election in respect of dividends and other payments paid gross will not be necessary where a notice of election under section 48 (7), Finance Act, 1965, has already been given.

14. The Council notes that an election under section 48 (7) appears to remain inapplicable to charges on income (e.g. interest) payable to a company owned by a consortium by one of the companies in that consortium. Such a situation may be unusual but is likely to arise in some cases and the Council is unable to appreciate why no election should be possible to pay such interest without deduction of income tax.

Paragraph 13 – Meaning of 'distribution'

15. The effect of paragraph 13 (3) is to exclude from the meaning of 'distribution' as defined by paragraph 1 (1) (d) (i) of Schedule 11, Finance Act 1965, interest on certain securities issued before April 6th, 1965. It is submitted that this date should be April 27th, 1965, being the date of publication of the Finance (No. 2) Bill 1965.

16. The Council submits that paragraph 13 (5), which brings into the definition of distributions, interest on securities connected with shares in the company, should not apply to any issue of shares or securities by a company to a second company where the second company in the ordinary course of its business provides finance for other companies by way of investing in shares or securities, and where that second company is not an associated company of the first company within the meaning of Schedule 18 (2), Finance Act 1965.

Paragraph 14 – Bonus issues following repayment of share capital to be treated as distributions: exclusion of repayment of preference shares

17. Broadly speaking paragraph 14 (1) excludes the operation of paragraph 1 (3) of Schedule 11, Finance Act 1965 in the case of fully-paid preference shares provided that the shares existed as issued and fully-paid preference shares on April 6th, 1965, or, if the shares were issued after April 6th, 1965, as fully-paid preference shares wholly for new consideration. It is submitted that in both respects (i.e. paragraph 14 (1) (a) and 14 (1) (b)) the relevant date should be April 27th, 1965, the date of publication of the Finance (No. 2) Bill 1965.

18. In respect of paragraph 1 (3) of Schedule 11 it is submitted that a bonus issue subsequent to a capital repayment should not attract surtax in the hands of the shareholder unless he was also the recipient of the repayment.

Paragraph 15 – Chargeable gains of groups of companies

19. Part I of Schedule 13, Finance Act 1965, dealing with chargeable gains in the case of groups of companies, provided that references to a company apply only to a company resident in the United Kingdom and within the meaning of the Companies Act 1948, etc. Schedule 4, paragraph 15, extends this to include reference to any company resident in the United Kingdom but formed under the law of a country or territory outside the United Kingdom. It is submitted that the reference should be further extended to include companies resident in the United Kingdom, however incorporated (e.g. by Royal Charter)<sup>1</sup>.

Paragraph 17 – Close companies: meaning of 'associate'

20. Paragraph 17 (1) modifies the definition of an associate in relation to an individual entitled or eligible to benefit under a trust. It is considered that as the persons affected appear to be whole-time service directors or comparable employees to whom restrictions under sections 379 and 388 schemes would not apply, there should be no limiting figure of remuneration or percentage shareholding. It is therefore submitted that the words 'and the individual in question' in line 46 to the end of paragraph 17 (1) (b) should be deleted.

Schedule 5 – Administration of Income Tax Acts

Paragraph 3 – Returns

21. Paragraph 3 prescribes the penalties for a company which has failed to comply with a notice to deliver a return of profits. It is submitted that consideration should be given to making the penalty prescribed in paragraph 3 (2) the amount of the net tax chargeable on the company, which amendment could be effected by deleting the word 'no' in line 11 on page 78.

Paragraph 7 – Assessments to corporation tax

22. Paragraph 7 (2) provides that an objection to the making of any assessment to corporation tax on the grounds that the time limit for making it has expired, shall only be made on an appeal against the assessment. This appears to go beyond anything contained in the Income Tax Acts and the Council therefore asks for an explanation of the purpose of this provision.

Paragraph 11 – Claims relating to corporation tax

23. Paragraph 11 (3) provides that claims for set off of capital allowances and trading losses, falling to be made for or incurred in an accounting period, against profits of that accounting period or earlier profits (under Finance Act 1965, sections 56 (6) and 58 (2)) must be made within two years from the end of that accounting period. This reduces the effective period from two years from the end of the fiscal year to two years from the accounting year-end. It is therefore submitted that the period stated should be either three years from the end of the accounting period or alternatively two years from the end of the financial year in which falls the accounting period for which the capital allowances fall to be made or, as the case may be, in which falls the accounting period in which the trading loss is incurred. (The alternative wording is basically that used in paragraph 18 (2) (b)).

24. In respect of paragraph 11 (4), assurance is sought that the agreement of a loss for corporation tax purposes will automatically constitute a claim for carry forward unless relief for the loss is claimed in some other form.

Paragraph 20 – Tax on close companies at standard rate of income tax

25. Paragraph 20 (1) provides that tax assessable on close companies under sections 75, 76 and 77 of the Finance Act 1965, shall, subject to any appeal against the assessment, be due within fourteen days after the issue of the notice of assessment. It is submitted that fourteen days is too short when the normal limit for appeals is thirty days.

26. Paragraph 20 (2) provides that all enactments relating to the assessment, etc., of income tax shall apply to tax chargeable under sections 75, 76 and 77, Finance Act 1965. It is submitted that, if the intention is to require notification of amounts chargeable on the company under those sections, this should be explicitly stated.

27. Paragraph 20 (5) applies section 495, Income Tax Act 1952 (interest on overdue income tax) to tax assessable on close companies at the standard rate. It is submitted that the normal rules for interest on overdue tax be applied, which would be achieved by the deletion of all words after 'Schedule D' in line 31.

28. It is further submitted that in the case of assessments under section 75, Finance Act 1965 (loans to participators) the interest, where the loan is repaid, should not run beyond the date of repayment since the tax itself would then become repayable.

Paragraph 24 – Responsibility of company officers

29. Paragraph 24 defines the responsibility of company officers in relation to corporation tax and sub-paragraph (3) defines in this respect the proper officer of a company which is a body corporate and the proper officer of a company which is not a body corporate. Under paragraph 24 (2) it would appear that the personal assets of the treasurer of an association could be sequestered to pay the tax of that association. This would appear to be unduly onerous.

CAPITAL GAINS

Schedule 9

Paragraph 1 – Life interests in settled property

30. It is submitted that the provisions of paragraph 1 (1) should apply to a release of part of the settled property as they apply to the exercise of a power of advancement.

Paragraph 4 – Assets held on April 6th, 1965, and affected by a company amalgamation

31. It is submitted that the effective date given in paragraph 4 (2) as May 17th, 1966, should be April 6th, 1965.

Paragraph 5 – Disposal of right to acquire shares

32. In regard to this paragraph the following submissions are made:

- (a) The substance of the paragraph should be applied also to the Case VII provisions.
- (b) Where only part of the rights under a provisional allotment are disposed of, clarification is necessary in regard to the attribution of:

- (i) the sales proceeds of the rights against the purchases of the original shares or debentures where these took place before and after 6th April 1965;
- (ii) the shares or debentures taken up under the rights issue to the purchases of the original shares or debentures where these took place before and after April 6th, 1965.

MINOR AND DRAFTING POINTS

33. Clause 27. It is submitted that the word 'or' should be added at the end of clause 27 (2) (a).

34. Schedule 5, paragraph 25. This paragraph refers to assessments to 'income tax' under section 77, Finance Act, 1965. It is submitted that the reference should be to assessments to 'tax'.

FINANCE ACT 1965

35. The Council wishes to draw attention to certain anomalies and difficulties contained in its memorandum 'Some taxation anomalies and practical difficulties arising out of the Finance Act 1965' (submitted to the Board of Inland Revenue on January 31st, 1966) which are still outstanding. These are noted on the attached list and attention is drawn in particular to the following:

Capital gains

Paragraph 1 – concerning a reasonable general exemption of the proceeds of chargeable assets, an exemption limit having already been accepted for chattels;

Paragraph 8 – concerning the date at which election for valuation on April 6th, 1965, becomes irrevocable;

Corporation tax

Paragraphs 12 and 13 – groups of companies;

Paragraph 41 – the difficulties in establishing the status of a company as close or otherwise controlled.

36. Following submission of the above memorandum, correspondence has taken place between the Board and the Council. The Council's letter of April 28th, 1966, and accompanying memorandum noted certain matters arising out of the Finance Act 1965 which are still under consideration. These were contained in paragraphs 1-5, 7 and 9 of that memorandum.

37. In addition to the matters mentioned in the two preceding paragraphs, the Council wishes to raise the following supplementary points arising out of the Finance Act 1965:

(a) Schedule 11 – paragraph 1 (2)

This paragraph deals with the transfer of assets or liabilities by a company to the members or to a company by its members. It is submitted that the provisions as to the deeming of the company making a distribution of an amount equal to any difference in value should not apply in the case of transfers within the group falling within the provisions of Part I of Schedule 13.

(b) Schedule 13 – Part I

Part I of this Schedule deals with chargeable gains in the case of groups of companies. Notwithstanding the provisions of this part of the schedule, it would appear that where the parent company is a close company, any transfers of assets within the group at less than market value will give rise to the operation of paragraph 18 of Schedule 7 of the 1965 Finance Act. It is submitted that this apparent anomaly should be dealt with by amending legislation.

(c) Section 41

This section makes a United Kingdom resident shareholder of a non-resident (but otherwise close) company liable on a proportionate part of the chargeable gains accruing to the company. Part I of Schedule 13 applies only to United Kingdom resident companies. Therefore, a gain accruing on the disposal of an asset by the non-resident company to another member of the group (whether the latter be resident or non-resident) will impose a liability on the shareholders – a liability which the company disposing of the asset would not itself have incurred had both companies concerned been resident in the United Kingdom. It is submitted that in applying section 41, the chargeable gain should be arrived at on the assumption that Part I of Schedule 13 (apart from paragraph 7) applies to non-resident, as well as to resident, companies.

(d) Schedule 7 – paragraph 3 (1)

This paragraph applies to capital distributions by a company including a distribution in the course of winding up. The effect of paragraph 13 of Schedule 18 is to make the whole of the company's income after the date of the commencement of winding-up subject to apportionment and assessment for surtax. All post-liquidation income, and for that matter pre-liquidation income so apportioned and assessed, will therefore be subject to corporation tax, income tax and surtax. Any balance of income remaining after the payment of these taxes will count as a capital distribution and give rise to a possible gain for capital gains tax. It is submitted that any amount which is subject to apportionment and assessment for surtax should be included in the definition of what is excepted from the meaning of a 'capital distribution' under paragraph 3 (4) of Schedule 7.

(e) Schedule 6 – paragraph 4

There appears to be no provision for the deduction from the consideration for the disposal of an asset, of expenditure incurred after the disposal. An obligation to make such a payment could be imposed on the vendor of an asset by the contract of sale, for example, the contract may contain a warranty, the non-fulfilment of which may involve the vendor in the payment of a capital sum at some later date. It is submitted that provision should be made for the adjustment of a chargeable gain or allowable loss in circumstances such as these, and, where necessary, for the repayment of tax already paid. The recipient of such a capital sum would no doubt become chargeable under section 22 (3).

Competitive Tendering

THE situation where a business sells at least a part of its output through open competitive tendering has always been a challenging one for the executives concerned. Fixing the right tender price has called for the formulation of judgements about the reactions of the company's customers and prospective action by competitors, and the taking into account of any number of uncertainties. All of these being in addition to the correct assessment of the reaction of the success or otherwise of the tender on the cost structure of the business.

Recent research in the United States now makes it possible to utilize the computer to assist management in reaching a decision in such cases. In the July/August 1965 issue of the Harvard Business Review, Mr Franz Edelman set out in an article entitled 'Art and science of competitive bidding' the design of a model for solving such problems, the general approach adopted for the model being based on a system devised by the Radio Corporation of America and tested by them in practice since 1964.

Use of the model requires the determination of three factors:

- The prospective marginal profit to be earned on the tender if it is accepted. Data for this is usually available through an appropriate analysis of the company's cost data.
- The marginal loss arising from any consequences of having the tender rejected.
- The degree of probability that the tender will be accepted. Here will be taken into account the specific customer/competitor relationships in the context of each tender.

The solution then requires the determination of a bid price which will maximize the 'profit expectation'. Profit expectation in this context can be defined as:

Marginal profit contribution  $\times$  success probability—(marginal loss consequence  $\times$  probability of failure).

The working of the system is clearly illustrated in a detailed case study given in the text of the article, but probably of even greater interest to those closely connected with this type of problem is an analysis of the seven cases where the Radio Corporation of America has tried out this approach in practice.

In all seven cases the basic data relating to each tender were formulated by operation and marketing personnel together with the systems analyst, and the information so derived was used by the marketing personnel in the normal way to determine the tender price. The same basic information was then fed into the computer and processed along the lines set out in the model to arrive at a tender price. In this way the company was able to compare each of the prices arrived at after the event with the lowest competitive tender. This comparison revealed the following results:

Tes:	Tender price under conventional method, percentage under (over) lowest competitive bid	Tender price with model, percentage under lowest competitive bid
2	(10.3)	0.6
3	(3.2)	2.8
4	10.6	4.4
5	(13.7)	3.1
7	1.8	1.8

Bearing in mind that the two prices were fixed using the same basic data in each case, the differences in price in relation to the lowest competitive bids are clearly significant. Those executives who may be involved in this type of problem should seriously consider the implications of this method of arriving at a tender price.

Blackwood Hodge

THE accounts of Blackwood Hodge Ltd, reprinted this week, should be read in conjunction with the reprint in our issue of July 2nd of the company's extremely full and detailed preliminary announcement. The summarized group results which formed part of that statement are repeated in the full report and accounts, but for reasons of space are not included in our present reprint.

The profit and loss account, it will be seen, begins with group sales and attention is directed to Note 1 on the opposite page (in the original) which provides a complete geographical breakdown of sales into home, export and overseas operations. Sales are also broken down into four headings, equipment, spare parts, servicing and hiring and sundries.

The immediate question, not unnaturally, is to ask why, if sales are broken down in this amount of detail, profits are not given the same treatment. The answer is that Blackwood Hodge is an agent and not a manufacturer and profit is not necessarily earned, or need not necessarily be accepted as earned, at the point where sales are made.

Scope for acceleration

A valid criticism which could be made concerning the Blackwood Hodge accounts is the length of time taken to get them out. The accounts are, in fact, dated May 31st, 1966, exactly seven months after the end of the financial year. Here again the company's agency operations and the geographical extent of those operations are a hindrance but even so there would appear to be scope for accelerating the accounting procedure.

A revaluation of properties as at October 31st, 1965, the accounting date, it will be seen, has been incorporated into the accounts. The surplus has been credited to capital reserve by means of a revaluation of the shares in the subsidiary companies concerned.

Properties still appearing in the balance sheet at cost less depreciation are in overseas territories and these were not valued 'for various reasons'. Property investments at cost (£862,160) comprise a block of residential apartments in the Congo (£227,205) acquired with funds blocked in that country – the purpose being to avoid the possibility of loss on exchange on currency balances – and an equity participation in a property development in North America (£634,955) which is expected to be liquidated within the next two years.

Tax position

The taxation position is put into perspective for shareholders in the directors' report. The total taxes borne by the group were £949,506, made up of tax of £779,351 charged in the accounts plus £170,156 payable to the Inland Revenue on the dividend accounted for gross. Total taxation was equivalent to an average rate of 57 per cent on group profit as compared with 44 per cent for the previous year.

In calculating the taxation provision no account has been taken of the possibility of relief under section 85 of the Finance Act 1965, nor of the transitional relief which may arise in respect of overseas taxes paid by certain of the group companies. The relief likely to be granted in these two instances is limited and short-term.

The long-term position is still to some extent uncertain but it must be assumed, shareholders are told, that taxation in the United Kingdom and in many of the overseas countries in which the group operates will take a much higher proportion of group trading profits than in the past.

This year profits will have to carry the gross dividend on the £1½ million of new 7½ per cent preference capital but the full benefit stemming from the additional capital will not accrue this year. The new preference capital, as Note 4 to the balance sheets shows, was placed and issued at the turn of the financial year-end.

Dividend policy

The impact of higher taxation and also of the need to finance growing turnover brings not necessarily cautionary but explanatory comment on dividend policy. The 1964-65 improvement in sales is reflected in increases in stocks by £1,543,066 and in debtors by £1,073,028. Growth in business is expected to continue – sales and earnings are to date showing increases parallel with last year's expansion rate – and this will inevitably result in further increases in investment in current assets.

The preference share issue provides an important addition to working resources and also increases the group's ability to arrange short-term borrowings. Even so, the directors 'consider it necessary to continue the policy which has been followed in the past and which has, in the last thirteen years, resulted in over £4 million of net profits being retained in the business and used to finance the expansion of the group's operations'.

In these circumstances, plus the unknown ultimate effect of tax changes, it is considered 'necessary and desirable that ordinary dividends should be well covered by distributable earnings'. There is confidence, however, that 'the group profits before tax will again increase' this year.

CITY NOTES

THE biting severity of the latest all-out credit squeeze has hit stock-markets hard. The build-up of the measures from the 7 per cent Bank rate and special deposits to the latest moves should certainly indicate that the Government really means business. But the most important feature of the impact of all this will be its effect on the opinion and attitude of those overseas.

Overseas financial centres were certainly not impressed with the Bank rate increase. Like the rise to 7 per cent previously – in 1964 – it was judged to have been made somewhat clumsily and at the eleventh hour, for the Bank of England had already been fighting a rearguard action on behalf of sterling.

Against such a background it takes more than mere 'measures' to restore confidence. That is a delicate plant which has to be nurtured, and despite the cures and curbs of the past few days, the testing time still lies ahead.

BUILDING society figures have shown that during the first half of this year the movement was lending on a record scale, but is still being shot at for falling down on its job. Mortgages are 'still hard to get'. The main trouble is that building societies are now carrying virtually the whole of the mortgage burden. Other lenders are out of the market. Another problem, inevitably, is rising house prices which means that a set amount of mortgage money does not cover as many individual mortgages as it did, even two or three years ago.

* * * *

THE City was decidedly interested in the Cunard company's direct approach to its sea-going staff through a four-page broadsheet called New Cunard. Produced in tabloid style, New Cunard pulled not a single punch in telling the staff the score point by point. If the ships don't pay they will have to be sold, staff were bluntly told. This is really what Sir Basil Smallpeice said in his annual report to shareholders but less directly. There must be many companies who could do with the courage of Sir Basil's convictions.

Ethical Standards of the Accounting Profession

American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, New York. $5.

The computer age has had a tremendous impact on accountants. In public practice no less than in commercial employment they have had to accept a re-orientation in viewpoint and method because the computer cannot be ignored and can, instead, be a tool of the accountant's work. Among the special difficulties encountered by the profession in this context are those preventing advertising of services, fee-sharing with others than fellow-professionals and the effect of these on the building-up of computer bureaux.

Since the same problems face members of the profession in every country as the C.P.A.s face in the United States, all accountants must be vitally interested in what the authors of this book have to say, and especially in what differences are apparent since Mr Carey's earlier book, Professional Ethics of Certified Public Accountants, appeared in 1956.

It would be a mistake, however, to think that the examination of professional ethics is restricted to the particular problems of computer advice. Mr Carey and Mr Doherty examine the whole basis of a professional code of ethics and come down clearly on the side of public interest as the prime motive. But having said this, they recognize that any code must imply a moral judgement between right and wrong as well as mere practical regulation within a body of men and women.

One point made early in the book is that the owner of a professional degree has a prima facie competence, but no practitioner can continue to have that competence unless he keeps abreast of current accounting literature and by taking courses provided by his professional societies, universities or other organizations.

The development of the practice of referring clients to a specialist firm for management advice is discussed and a C.P.A. rule has been devised to prevent the specialist from accepting an extension in services beyond the specific engagement without first consulting with the referring member. The dissemination of literature to acquaint clients of the services available in the management field is acceptable but must be given to non-clients only if specifically requested.

The C.P.A. rules specifically forbid the provision of any service to clients through the medium of a corporation, but separate practices are not forbidden.

Members of other accountancy bodies will find this review of absorbing interest. Appendices include excerpts from the American Institute's bye-laws, the latest amendments to the Code of Professional Ethics, opinions of the Committee on Professional Ethics, and informal opinions.

Accounting for Price-level Changes: Theory and Procedures

Pergamon Press, Oxford. 21s net.

The subject of accounting for price-level changes is well-known to readers of this journal; apart from Professor Baxter's article in 1948, followed by a prolonged correspondence under the title '1880 and all that', contributions by such protagonists as Mr Sewell Bray and Mr Harry Norris, and a visit by the great George O. May himself, made this a recurring topic even before The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales issued a recommendation to its members which was hotly criticized both by the Society of Incorporated Accountants and Auditors and the Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, followed by a complete review of the subject by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants and a private pamphlet by Mr Bibby, of Liverpool.

Fortunately, this was not the end of the story, as Mr W. E. Parker, C.B.E., F.C.A., demonstrated at the International Congress of Accountants in New York in 1962.

All this is history and as such is recorded in the opening pages of this present book. However, it is less in the recording of this history than in the demolishing of a hidebound attitude and the demonstration that a practical attitude can take its place, that the author is interested: and here the open-minded reader will find not merely a discussion of the theory of the subject but practical examples on presentation also. Especially important is the distinction drawn between the reserve attributable to a general increase in the index, and the uplift to account for the increase in replacement value of a unit of stock in trade (which may be greater).

The use of the word 'profit' to describe the paper write-up attributable purely to holding goods in an inflationary period ('holding profit') is, however, doubtful as no profit can really exist until goods have been sold. Mr Gynther recognizes this in a later section when he speaks of treating holding profits (and losses) as matters to be adjusted against capital reserves and not revenue profits. One must, however, obviously avoid including here losses through bad judgement in making purchases or excluding from ordinary profits the benefit obtained from buying well by good judgement (the 'good buy').

Many of the references in the book are to American and Australian rather than English written works, but the sections on practical implementation are excellently argued, with a helpful analysis of the actual work being done by individual companies who try to adopt the method in some way or other; included in these is Philips Electrical Industries as the only one to go the whole way, and Philips' accounts are taken in some detail to illustrate the author's views.

A good bibliography is included and the book has the exceptional merit of being easy to read.

Industrial Reorganization Corporation Bill

SIR, — The Chief Secretary to the Treasury has rejected the setting up of a joint standing consultative committee with the accountancy profession, in particular because of the impossibility of seeking the profession's views on questions of Budget policy before the Budget. There is no reason, however, why the profession should not examine and pronounce upon intending legislation such as the Industrial Reorganization Corporation Bill. Of the plans for the Corporation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said: '... the amalgamations which may be encouraged for the sake of efficient production will be carried out with the active co-operation of the businesses concerned'. But The Times described the Bill as vague, and that the usefulness of a body such as the Corporation depends on the way it is operated, rather than on its precise terms of reference.

In buying equities the Corporation would not be putting any new money into the companies whose shares are transacted, except in certain conditions. Without such capital there cannot be any right of direction by the Corporation within companies and the degree of authority would depend upon the amount of capital owned. If the Corporation were to own a controlling interest then — as The Times put it — this could be fortuitous nationalization of a company. At any rate, it must surely be for the Corporation to investigate, prescribe and implement recommendations for reorganization problems within candidate companies, although how candidates will be selected or how, after selection, the remedy can be effected is unknown.

I ask, therefore, how it is proposed the Corporation should stimulate take-overs. The basis of acquisitions is often through a share exchange thereby minimizing cash outgo, and it establishes the consolidated balance sheet: the ability to bring about a group structure will be influenced by any quotation and affect net assets value. Behind these obvious financial aspects, there are the human dramas in all acquisitions: the harmonizing, if possible, of different boards of directors, the central as opposed to the local control, and so on.

With these very few comments I hope that Sir Frank Kearton, the chairman of the Corporation, will explain how the Corporation is to become a practical entity. In my mind it is absolutely essential that business knows, now, that the Government has at least on this occasion thought its policies through. I do not think it has.

Yours faithfully,

C. A. PERRY, F.A.C.C.A., J.DIP.M.A., M.I.M.C.

Carshalton, Surrey.

Registration

SIR, — I was recently privileged to attend a meeting of the South West Essex Group of Chartered Accountants to consider a report which had been prepared by a sub-committee on the question of registration. The Secretary of the Group, at 187a South Street, Romford, Essex, will no doubt be pleased to send a copy of the report to any member who would care to apply to him for one.

The members present unanimously approved the report and passed a resolution calling for circulation of the report to the President of the Institute and all district societies for an exchange of views and recommending the report as a basis for further discussion. The report suggests progress either by widening the basis and scope of membership of the Institute or by the creation of an 'umbrella' council over all existing societies of accountants and other full-time practitioners who could satisfy certain basic requirements. This latter course commended itself to all the sub-committee.

The meeting discussed at length the circular issued by the Institute and other bodies on March 30th last, which referred to talks then in progress. Many members feared that this did not indicate complete regulation and control of the whole of the profession which the meeting emphatically favoured. It was generally agreed that past attempts to unify the profession had been foiled by a few die-hards and it would be catastrophic if this further attempt also failed, leaving the problem to be faced afresh under, probably, more difficult conditions in another decade or two.

Yours faithfully,

ROBERT BARLOW, V.R.D., F.C.A.

Chelmsford, Essex.

Training for the Profession

SIR, — Recently many members of the accountancy profession have publicly bemoaned the shortage of articulated clerks and the desirability of encouraging a higher grade of entrant into articles. Various reasons for the shortage have been proffered, those most frequently quoted being too simple to be the real reasons (but they are important nevertheless), namely, the pitifully small salaries offered, and the length and monotony of the groundwork.

Firstly, the small salary. To encourage more 'A' level school-leavers to forsake a university education, with all its attendant glamour and prestige (whether justified or not), for a stolid 'City' job proof is needed not only that the resulting professional qualification is as worthwhile and as acceptable as a university degree, but also the further incentive of a realistic salary. For a young man today earning less than £10 a week, it is well-nigh impossible to save any capital for use when qualified, e.g. for marriage or for such items as a car – pressures which bear far more on a young man at home than one at university. By being unable to start saving a real 'nest egg' till he is qualified (at say 22–23), any of the above is 'out' until he is, at best, around 25. Although in the words of the advertisement – 'a longer view must be taken' – seven years of saying 'No, I can't afford that yet', seven years of self-denial, is a little too much to expect.

Secondly, the period of articleship. For a person of 'A' level or higher standard of education who, in the study for such higher education, has been taught to use his own imagination and encouraged to indulge in creative and original thought, to be subjected to four years of virtual sterility of intelligence is off-putting to say the least. For 'A' level school-leavers the choice between going to university and entering a profession as a basis for a career in business is extremely difficult, though it is in the role of accountancy as a training ground for management that I feel the real answer for the shortage lies.

What is needed is a form of training similar to that practised by the much-vaunted business schools. For example, after the Intermediate examination a clerk might have the choice of two Final courses: one of a more financially technical nature intended to train the clerk solely for practice as an accountant; the other with the emphasis being placed on the application of accountancy in management and on the business of management itself. Had such a scheme been in operation, a fully-trained and constant source of management material would have been forthcoming; more school-leavers would have been encouraged into accountancy as it would then have emerged as the only real basis of management training; and finally the numerous firms of management consultants and business efficiency experts would never have been needed, for this role would have been adequately filled by the accountancy profession.

Apart from the theoretical side of a syllabus slanted towards preparation for management, the opportunity could be given to the clerks to watch management in action and even to assist, however meagerly, in its performance. This could be done by farming the clerks out into business in a manner similar to that practised by the Certified Accountants, but in a more enduring manner by restricting the clerk to one particular firm or industry, thus giving experience 'in depth'.

Finally, the example of good management must be set within the profession itself. Too often accountants' offices are totally lacking in organization, internal control and efficiency of operation, in a word, in good management. And this in a profession which claims to be the training ground for management.

I fully realize, Sir, that discussions with particular reference to the training of articled clerks, the nature of the training, and the possible rationalization of the profession are indeed under way – as they have been before. Let us hope, however, that this time the urgency of the present situation stirs a real effort on the part of the powers-that-be, not only to produce an answer, but also to produce the answer – and quickly.

Yours faithfully,
PETER E. RICKITT,
Articled Clerk.

Business Advice for Ex-prisoners

Assistance of Accountants required by Advisory Bureau

It is perhaps understandable for a discharged prisoner to be regarded with mistrust, despite his having paid the price to re-enter society, with the result that to start a business on release is not always an easy matter. Any scheme, then, to assist him in conducting his business affairs is to be welcomed.

One such scheme in which ex-prisoners are aided in setting up their own businesses and who need, but are unable to afford, the services of an accountant has been instituted (with the approval of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales) by Mr Neville Shulman, A.C.A. Known as the Business Advisory Bureau and run with the assistance of officers of Toynbee Hall and the Blackfriars Settlement, its primary aim is to prevent an ex-prisoner who is commencing his own business from returning to crime through his inability to organize proper records and budget his finances against fluctuations in sales and income.

Mr Shulman makes regular visits to Toynbee Hall to meet ex-prisoners who need financial advice as well as visiting the various London prisons. A typical case of assistance under the scheme concerned a young man, Joe, aged 26, serving a term of eighteen months, who wanted to purchase an ice-cream van on release and obtain an ice-cream round with a partner. One visit was necessary to the prison to meet him and find out exactly what he intended to do. The financial possibilities were investigated and the subsequent negotiations supervised. On release the actual purchase was arranged and the necessary books and records set up. Joe reports regularly to Toynbee Hall and brings his books and bank statements for inspection. A deposit account has been arranged with joint signatures in order to build up a reserve against the winter months.

It is hoped that the bureau will eventually become nationwide, somewhat similar to the Citizens' Advice Bureau which is lending support to the scheme. Mr Shulman is in need of sincere assistance from members of the profession in London and in other parts of the country who are willing to help in this worth-while work by visiting prisons and attending consulting rooms to deal with queries and problems. Alternatively, he would like to hear from accountants willing to be placed on a register to take ex-prisoners as clients at such time as their supervisor feels they are ready and able to pay for the advice given to them. It should be emphasized, however, that volunteers must opt for one or other of the two sides of the scheme.

The work can be very interesting and those who feel they would like to participate in the scheme or require further information should contact Mr Shulman at 6 Cavendish Court, 11/15 Wigmore Street, London W1.

OBITUARY

AN APPRECIATION

The death of Sir Bernhard Binder, F.C.A., on July 11th, at the age of 89, was noted in our last issue. We are indebted to Sir William Lawson, C.B.E., B.A., F.C.A., for the following appreciation.

B. H. Binder came to London as a young man without influence or connections at a time when these were perhaps more important for a successful career than they are today. He started work with a company in the City but shortly afterwards he joined the staff of Messrs McAuliffe, Davies & Hope who recognized his ability and gave him his articles. This was the beginning of a career which led him to become one of the leaders of the profession and President of the English Institute. He possessed a remarkably quick and clear mind to which was coupled boundless energy and immense stamina. It is said that until he was in his sixties he had not missed a day's work through illness or indisposition. It is certainly true that he took no study leave when working for his Institute examinations and yet came first in the Final. He worked immensely long hours and at times his colleagues found to their consternation that he was still as ready for work at two o'clock in the morning as he had been in the afternoon.

He came rather late into full participation in Institute affairs and was 71 when he was elected President. This appointment gave him great pleasure and he proved a most energetic, successful and popular President.

Many will remember his brisk and alert manner, his remarkable intellect and memory, his industry and efficiency and the capacity which he had for getting quickly to the heart of a problem. There was, however, another side to his character. He was a great reader and loved to quote from the books he had read; at times he wrote verses himself. He will, moreover, be remembered by those who worked with him for his humanity and interest in other people. He could always find time to discuss the problems of individual members of the staff and he was generous and sympathetic in his outlook. Until he retired from the firm he insisted on seeing each member of the staff at Christmas time, a task which became very onerous as the firm increased in size. He will be remembered with great affection by all those who worked with him and by a much wider circle of friends in the City and in the profession.

The first report of the Society from its formation on May 1st to December 31st last shows that membership at the end of the year numbered 682.

Among the Society's activities was a well attended meeting at Southampton in June on the 1965 Finance Bill, and in October over thirty members visited the Hampshire County Council's computer installation at Winchester; they were joined later in the day by a further seventy members at the Royal Hotel to hear an address on 'Corporation tax and the close company'.

The Society's local members' groups at Aldershot, Bournemouth, Dorchester, Portsmouth, Salisbury and Southampton had active programmes of meetings during the year, the Isle of Wight branch met only once but none the less participated in the Society's functions.

The principal event mentioned in the report was the very successful two-day residential tax conference held at Poole in January of this year. Attended by 170 members, the conference was organized along lines of an Institute summer course in miniature with lectures and discussion groups, and each of the speakers having an opportunity of visiting the discussion groups in turn.

Mr S. S. Ross, chief internal auditor to Joseph Lucas (Industries) Ltd since 1957, has been elected President of the London Chapter of the Institute of Internal Auditors for 1966-67.

Mr Ross had wide experience of the machinery of government and of the workings of industry. In 1946 he was appointed joint secretary and director of organization and methods to the Government of Bengal. He later joined the Government of the Federation of Malaya, and while there advised the Federation and neighbouring Commonwealth Governments on matters concerning their administration.

RATES IN 1966-67

Of the 823 local authorities included in The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants' Return of Rates 1966-67<sup>1</sup> published last week, 810 show an increase in rate poundage, 1 a decrease and 12 no change. The sample, which includes well over half of the rating authorities in England and Wales, is representative of all sizes and types of authorities and includes all the county boroughs and London boroughs.

The return shows that local authority expenditure has risen by more than the rise in rate poundage and if the majority of authorities had not used balances in hand to offset the increases in expenditure, rates would have risen more sharply. Of the 823 authorities included in the survey, 691 reduced their balances, while 80 added to them and 52 left them unchanged. Part of the rise in expenditure is also absorbed by the increased rateable resources arising from property development and is similarly not reflected in the rate poundage.

ACCOUNTANTS AND
THE LAW OF NEGLIGENCEby R. W. V. DICKERSON, B.Com., LL.B., Ph.D., C.A.

A subject of great interest and concern to the accounting profession is the question of accountants' legal responsibility. At the present time no comprehensive volume fully covering the subject is available and this book is designed to fill this gap.

The book discusses in considerable detail the accountant's duty and standard of care, his liability to his clients and to third parties if negligence or fraud is proved. It covers his various responsibilities not only in his capacity as accountant and auditor but also as tax or business adviser, arbitrator and valuer.

A collection of fifty-seven leading Court cases in England, Ireland, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, India and Canada, as well as cases in various States of the United States, are reprinted and arranged to suit the convenience of both accountants and lawyers.

Decisions which are reported in the standard law reports have not been reproduced but quotations more extensive than is usual in a legal textbook have been made from the judgments. In this way, the book is fully usable by those who do not have access to a law library.

Cases which are unreported or which have been reported only in a series of law reports now out of print or less well-known are reproduced in their entirety. For the unreported cases the official transcript of the Court's decision or the trial judge's summation has been used or, where this was impossible to obtain, the report as it appeared in a newspaper or other journal has been reproduced.

The author is a Canadian chartered accountant and lawyer who has practised in Canada as an accountant and later as a lawyer. He obtained a Ph.D. in taxation law at the London School of Economics and returned to Canada to join the Faculty of Law at the University of British Columbia. He is joint author with Professor G. S. A. Wheatcroft and others of Estate and Gift Taxation and has written numerous articles in legal and accounting journals.

His analysis covers, among other subjects, the legal aspects of these major areas:

DUTY OF CARE

Statutory and non-statutory audits
Dangers in unwritten audit contracts

STANDARD OF CARE

Reliance on experts
The audit report:
- ambiguous and misleading reports
- qualifications and disclaimers
- differences in audit of public and private companies
- libellous reports
The audit period:
- interim audit work
- responsibility for post-balance sheet events.

VERIFICATION OF PARTICULAR ITEMS AND TRANSACTIONS

What the Courts have had to say about verification procedures in particular circumstances
The auditor's responsibility for knowing the law, and the audit of a trustee's accounts.

THE MEASURE OF DAMAGES

How damages are assessed against an accountant who has been found negligent
Topics of consequential damages, reliance, remoteness and certainty of damage, prior remedies and mitigation of damages.

LIABILITIES OF THIRD PARTIES

The development of the law in this area on the responsibility of the accountant to persons other than his client.

OTHER DUTIES AND FUNCTIONS OF THE PROFESSIONAL
ACCOUNTANT

The accountant's duty of secrecy
The accountant and conflicts of interest
Cases dealing with the legal responsibilities of the accountant when acting as business adviser, tax adviser, arbitrator and valuer.

664-page volume, priced at 67s should be in every accountant's office.

AN IMPORTANT NEW BOOK
Just published

MANUAL OF AUDITING

by Vivian R. V. Cooper, F.C.A.

THE FIRST

In recent years the whole approach to auditing has changed. The old concepts of routine checking and vouching have gone and new standards are being set and new procedures evolved. This has become more than ever necessary by the increasing use of computers for which auditing techniques now have to be designed.

Taking as his starting-point the system of internal control installed by management, the auditor's task is to point out the weaknesses to his client and to make a tailor-made audit programme to fit the job in which tests of the day-to-day transactions are cut to a minimum. The auditor now observes, at regular intervals, the physical stock-taking carried out by his client's staff; if his report to shareholders is not to be qualified, he requires his client to maintain a higher standard of book-keeping and accounts than hitherto. His audit is carefully planned and is backed by a well defined system for the preparation, filing and presentation of working papers.

This book, which includes a comprehensive set of specimen forms and schedules, is the first of its kind in the United Kingdom which sets out these modern techniques and procedures in a readily understandable form. It is essentially practical and, except for a few changes necessary to make it suitable for publication, is based on the manual which has been developed over a long period of years, and is in daily use, by a firm of chartered accountants in practice.

The Last Chance

FOR nearly two decades successive Governments have sought to explain the facts of economic life to the British nation. Throughout that period the nation has become ever more prosperous for less and less effort; for most people Government spokesmen have cried 'wolf' too often for them to feel that the successive economic crises have anything to do with the ordinary public. It remains to be seen whether the latest measures announced by Mr WILSON will have any greater degree of success in impressing public opinion. If their impact is merely to raise the figure of registered unemployed by barely half of 1 per cent as has been suggested by responsible Ministers, then it can safely be said that the events of last week were a complete waste of time. The only justification for such expedients would rest in the possibility that the pace of world inflation may catch up with that in the United Kingdom.

The precise effects of the Government's measures are as uncertain as are some of the measures themselves. The sharp increase in hire-purchase deposits and the 10 per cent surcharge on the alcohol and petroleum duties, as well as purchase tax, are simple enough to evaluate. The proposed cuts in the foreign travel allowance have still to be clarified but they are certainly severe. Thus a commensurate cut in the Government's own overseas expenditure would convert the present balance of payment deficit into a surplus. The extension of control over office development in the south will reduce still further the declining pressure on the constructional trades.

In contrast, the proposals affecting the Government's own massive expenditure at home and abroad are distinctly modest. The proposed cut next year of £95 million in the investment programme of the nationalized industries should be set against the total cost of nearly £1,400 million of that programme. Nor is the promised reduction of £55 million out of the Government's current outlay of several thousand million exactly impressive.

On the other hand, these cuts must be seen as just one part of the current deflationary policy. Taken in conjunction with the higher Bank rate and credit squeeze, to say nothing of the effects of the selective employment tax, these further measures announced by Mr WILSON should together constitute the most severe measure of disinflation experienced in Britain during the past two decades. It is therefore pertinent to inquire just what the outcome of this policy is likely to be.

On the credit side the prospective recession should create an economic climate in which considerably less overtime will be paid for and in which employers will be rather more reluctant than of late to grant further pay demands. This presupposes that the unemployment level will rise considerably above 2 per cent. If the Government is going to cry 'halt' once the unemployed total reaches some 400,000 or even 500,000 – to say nothing of extensive short-time working which will delay the full impact of the deflation – then there is little purpose served by the latest moves. To make this point is not to assert that unemployment is good either for the economy or management. It is merely to restate the simple fact that since earlier efforts at redeployment of labour have been abortive, the next attempt must be sharper in its impact.

In such conditions consumer expenditure will certainly contract and the consequent lower level of incomes will ensure substantial cuts in the import total. On the debit side, however, the consequences of the Government's policy are much easier to predict. The turndown in consumer demand will affect output and will lead industrialists to defer new investment. Since British industry has not invested sufficiently in labour-saving plant and modern equipment in the past, this further delay in the realization of the technological revolution will leave manufacturers even less capable of meeting the boom in demand in the next upswing two to three years hence. Already the substitution of the old investment allowance by the new cash grants represents a smaller incentive to firms to invest. The promised deflation could be the last straw.

It is this aspect of the situation which is the most serious. It cannot be stressed often enough that Britain's root problem is not the balance of payments deficit. That is merely the symptom of the 'English sickness', i.e. low productivity and high incomes. It can be argued that a sharp dose of deflation will generate the economic climate required to encourage greater productivity but, as we argued in last week's issue, it is most improbable that the deflation can be pushed to the necessary degree of severity. It is the lack of positive measures to provide industry with incentives to produce at low cost and to export that constitutes the most striking omission from the Government's policy statement.

If any additional evidence were needed of the lack of interest in overseas markets by most British producers, a recent survey of United Kingdom foreign trade carried out by Martech Ltd on behalf of the Port of London Authority provides it. Half of all United Kingdom exports by value are accounted for by only one hundred firms and ten of these account for 20 per cent of those exports. In tonnage terms the concentration is more marked: five firms account for 20 per cent and fifty for almost half all exports by tonnage. The main regions for export firms are London and the South-east with 19 per cent of the value, and the North-west with 16 per cent. The corresponding figure for the Midlands is 13 per cent.

Perhaps the most striking fact to emerge from the survey is the pattern of imports. The total import bill is dominated by manufactured goods, with food and raw materials second and third. Clearly, higher industrial productivity at home would make a policy of import substitution a possibility. Even allowing for the buoyant state of world trade, it should be possible to make a bigger impact on the balance of trade deficit by cutting imports than by increasing exports which, all things considered, are not doing badly.

The one part of the Government's plans which might have proved really helpful is already in danger of failure, partly because it has not been fully worked out by the Ministers responsible. The standstill on incomes for six months could provide a useful breathing space, but it is already quite clear that several powerful unions are convinced that the policy should not apply to them. It was the Government's avowed intention that, whatever the position regarding any pay claim or award, its implementation should be deferred for at least six months. This was and could be very rough justice but such policies are never anything else. The 64,000 dollar question is simple – Will the Government have the courage to enforce this policy? The first signs that it is doing just that will do more for the £ than the rest of the measures that have been taken.

Failure to enforce the incomes standstill would be serious; it would be utterly disastrous, however, if the Government insisted then on the prices standstill. It is quite obvious that companies can be forced to accede to the Government's requests more easily than the trade unions. As the result of Mr BROWN's intervention earlier this year many companies have deferred price increases which they believe would be justified by increases in their costs. A further six or twelve months' extension of price controls without a corresponding control on incomes would be the height of folly.

For the time being the danger of devaluation has been removed but this is not to assert that confidence in the future of sterling is any greater than it was before. No doubt Britain can continue to rely on international help for the £ if only because of the consequences for the world's monetary system of a sterling collapse. Likewise, the United Kingdom can go on liquidating its dollar assets in supporting operations in the exchange markets of the world; but in the meantime unless something positive is done to strengthen the British economy by raising productivity, the outcome, although deferred, is inevitable. This is the measure of the Government's task. The events of last week were merely a first payment.

A Deal is not a Settlement

PART XVIII of the Income Tax Act 1952 is directed against avoidance by means of settlements. Sections 392 and 393 deal with what are termed 'dispositions', which are defined as including 'any trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement'.

Section 393 deals with irrevocable dispositions made before April 22nd, 1936, in favour of infant children of the settlor. Section 392 deals with income (under a disposition) which is payable for a period which cannot exceed six years. It expressly provides (unlike section 393) that it does not affect a disposition 'made for valuable and sufficient consideration'.

Sections 403 and 411 of the Income Tax Act 1952 which deal respectively with settlements on infant children and settlements in general, both define 'settlement' to include 'any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement . . . arrangement' but section 403 also includes 'transfer of assets'. Although 'disposition' is imported from the earlier provisions, there is no express exemption for a settlement 'made for valuable and sufficient consideration'.

The question therefore arises whether every 'disposition, and every 'arrangement' is a settlement within sections 403 and 411, in which case chaos would ensue. But until last week there was remarkably little authority on the point.

In Copeman v. Coleman (18 A.T.C. 109) the Crown seems to have conceded that a 'bona fide commercial transaction' could not be a settlement, even on the wide definition in the section and notwithstanding that there was no express exemption for bona fide commercial transactions. Mr Justice LAWRENCE said:

'In my opinion it is impossible to come to any other conclusion but that this was not a bona fide commercial transaction, and it appears to me that this was a disposition within the meaning of the definition in (section 403), or an arrangement in the nature of a disposition . . . '.

Nowhere did the judge himself hold that a bona fide commercial transaction could not also be a settlement.

In C.I.R. v. Leiner (43 A.T.C. 56), Mr Justice PLOWMAN said:

'it is common ground that it is implicit in the fasciculus of sections, of which section 401 forms a part, that some element of bounty is necessary to make the sections apply, and that a bona fide commercial transaction would be excluded from their operation: see the case of Copeman v. Coleman'.

This dictum contains two statements, one saying that an element of bounty is necessary to a settlement, which was a novel one, and the other saying that a bona fide commercial transaction could not be a settlement. This importation of the concept of bounty seems to have been borrowed from estate duty law in relation to inter vivos gifts.

It may be that the Revenue have now repented of their readiness to accept these conventions, judging by the case of Bulmer and others v. C.I.R. which was reported in The Times of July 21st.

In 1954 the appellants owned about 30 per cent of the shares of Bulmer & Lumb (Holdings) Ltd ('Bulmer') which were rising sharply on the Stock Exchange. Fearing a take-over bid, they devised a scheme with Sanderson, Murray & Elder (Holdings) Ltd ('Sanderson') who was also opposed to a take-over. Sanderson incorporated a small subsidiary which bought the appellants' shares in Bulmer at much less than market price, with the price left outstanding as an interest-free loan. The subsidiary borrowed £250,000 from Sanderson at 5 per cent (repayable on demand) to use in buying up further Bulmer shares in the market. The appellants had the option, after the subsidiary had repaid the £250,000, to purchase the Bulmer shares from the subsidiary in consideration of the cancellation of the interest-free loan. The subsidiary used the Bulmer dividends first to pay interest to Sanderson, secondly to acquire more Bulmer shares, and lastly to pay back the £250,000.

Under the scheme the appellants transferred 552,262 shares to the subsidiary at a price of £138,065. By June 1961 the subsidiary held 2,260,595 Bulmer shares whose cost was £348,594 and market value £875,980. The Inland Revenue contended that the Bulmer dividends going to the subsidiary were income of the appellants. They based the claim on sections 404 (2), 405 (1), 409 (1), (2), (5), 411 (2) and 415.

Allowing the appeals, Mr Justice PENNYCUICK said that on the documents the relationship between the appellants and the subsidiary was that of vendor and purchaser with an option to repurchase. This was a bona fide commercial transaction or, to apply an entirely different test, there was no bounty. That it was framed to confer tax advantages did not mean that it was a settlement. The Revenue could have contended before the Special Commissioners that the documents were a sham and that the true nature of the transaction was that it was a mortgage, but they did not do so.

£39,000 Casual Profit Taxed

THE proprietor of a firm of auctioneers and estate agents in Bristol is to be required to pay tax under Case VI of Schedule D on £39,000 which he received from Ravensett Properties Ltd to compensate him for his disappointment in not being permitted to join with Ravensett in a development scheme. This was the decision of Cross, J., in the High Court on Monday allowing the Crown's appeal from a decision of the Special Commissioners who had held that the sum was not taxable under Case I, Case II or Case VI.

Mr Ricketts was employed to act for the Bristol Co-operative Society in its claim for compensation from the Bristol Corporation in respect of a site in Merchant Street, and to obtain another site there for the Society. He found a site elsewhere, and he proposed to set up his own development company and to obtain an assignment of the Society's Merchant Street site to that company for development. The Society agreed but the Corporation then tried to break off negotiations about Merchant Street. It was then that Ravensett proposed to take over the development and either to allow Mr Ricketts to join in or to compensate him by the £39,000 payment. It wrote to him proposing that he should withdraw from any claim he might have to participate in the development of the site, in consideration of £39,000. He accepted this offer.

Appealing against the assessments on it he argued that either he had something to sell in which case this was a capital profit, or he had not in which case the payment was gratuitous. His lordship held, however, that the payment was made under a contract in consideration of the recipient giving his consent to the transaction between Ravensett and the Corporation. It was therefore paid for a service and was neither a capital profit nor a gratuitous payment.

Need for Middle Management

SPEAKING to members of a seminar on management education arranged by the Foundation for Management Education on July 21st, Mr Fred Catherwood, director-general of the National Economic Development Council, emphasized the importance of increasing the United Kingdom's supply of professional middle management. He said that in his own company two years ago, where he had the opportunity of being able to compare the management methods of British and American companies, American productivity was higher because it used a much larger proportionate number of marketing specialists, industrial engineers, plant engineers, purchasing officers, and operational research specialists. He went on to say that there were more managers per unit of output and far fewer men in the American set-up than in the British one.

Mr Catherwood said that this American pattern must be established in the United Kingdom because it was a small island with scarce manpower. It was necessary to have professional top management of a high calibre but it was no longer sufficient to have a few brilliant men in charge because the industrial process was far too complex to rely on the genius of the few.

This management problem is the counterpart to a similar situation on the technical side where high quality technologists in British industry must increasingly be supported by high quality technicians.

Productivity in Fuel and Power

WITH natural gas much in the news, the rising performance of the United Kingdom fuel and power industries so far as productivity is concerned is a useful background towards understanding the highly competitive market in which natural gas will have to operate.

According to the July issue of the Progress Report of the Department of Economic Affairs, coal provided 62 per cent of the primary fuel in the United Kingdom in 1965. Oil consumption has been increasing quickly and provided 35 per cent of the total. The remaining

3 per cent was provided as to 2 per cent by nuclear power and the remaining 1 per cent by hydro-electricity and imports of natural gas. The contribution from nuclear power is rising rapidly.

So far as secondary fuel is concerned (electricity, gas and solid smokeless fuel) 63 per cent of total coal consumption is used for this purpose compared with 46 per cent ten years ago (based on 1965 figures). Electricity represents nearly one-third of total final fuel consumption and gas accounts for 7½ per cent of primary fuel requirements. Some 40 per cent of direct coal consumption is taken by industry. Among secondary fuels, 39 per cent of electricity sales go to industry compared with 28 per cent of town gas sales.

Productivity has been increasing rapidly in the fuel and power industries. Output per man-shift has increased in the last ten years to 1965 from an average of under 25 cwt to about 37 cwt. Sales of electricity have more than doubled in the last decade from a smaller number of generating stations and for an increase of only 20 per cent in employees. In the gas industry a 27½ per cent increase in sales from 1961-65 was brought about with a small decrease in employees. In the oil industry, consumption of oil for fuel and power purposes increased threefold between 1955 and 1965 while the number of employed increased by only 20 per cent.

Monopolies Commission and the Supply of Petrol

ANSWERING a Parliamentary Question last week, Mr Douglas Jay, M.P., President of the Board of Trade, announced that he had received voluntary undertakings from all suppliers of petrol and lubricants to retailers in the United Kingdom with one exception – Total Oil Products (G.B.) Ltd. Mr Jay said that he was satisfied that the undertakings would remedy the abuses identified by the Monopolies Commission in their report published on July 23rd of last year. He added that in the case of Total Oil Products (G.B.) Ltd he proposed to proceed forthwith by a Statutory Order to come into force on the same day as the undertakings, August 6th, 1966.

Part I of the undertakings limits the duration of solus petrol ties to five years, although they can run on after this provided that a retailer can terminate a tie on giving twelve months' notice. A tie accepted in conjunction with a loan or mortgage agreement may be expressed to extend until the loan is repaid but the retailer must have the option (provided he has repaid the loan) of ending the tie at any time after five years on giving twelve months' notice. Arrangements for the supply of petrol equipment which restrict the use of that equipment must also be terminable after five years. There is provision for a winding-up on a similar basis

by An Industrious Accountant

THE auditors were engaged on their final audit of our accounts and their two seniors visited me for a chat about some items in the profit and loss account. They had some routine queries about the usual non-allowables in our tax computations – subscriptions, repairs and renewals, sundry provisions, and so on.

Actually, the talk was brief enough. We always have our approximate assessments worked out in advance with reasonable accuracy, and cross-referenced analyses are attached. The auditors regularly pose queries and take notes for submission to the taxation section in their office, whence a draft computation will in due course be directed to the Inspector of Taxes. Some time later we'll receive the demand note, payable January next, and depending on the bank overdraft position we'll remit a couple of instalments in settlement.

But it all seems to me to be such a nonsensical and wasteful procedure. Why, in today's struggle for productivity and progress, should we squander so much time, paper and talk on such an absurd system? Why should able and aspiring young accountants – the cream of the profession capable of achievements far beyond these prosaic trivialities – act as a mixture of a post office and a junior clerk? We're looking down the road to a great future with new triumphs . . . surely a start can be made by scrapping this out-dated routine and dealing with tax as its masters rather than its servants. A change is needed.

As a profession I think we should insist that every company's tax liability should be assessed and agreed between those who best know the facts – the auditors and the company's chief accountant – and thereafter accepted formally by the Revenue.

Gone are the days when the auditor interpreted the records of an unskilled book-keeper to a remote inspector who adjusted the assessment in a dozen lines of figures. Such a performance was reminiscent of William Pitt introducing to the House of Commons a Budget scrawled in four lines on the back of an envelope. The mid-twentieth century is high time for a new approach, streamlined and scientific, economical in manpower.

The suggested system only needs to be sold firmly; its efficiency is surely self-evident. The interests of the Treasury can be guarded by provision for the Revenue to spot-check when, where and as they feel to be necessary, and a rule that every company over a minimum size should be compelled to have a qualified accountant responsible for its records. At prescribed higher levels of assets or capital, a qualified accountant should be statutorily required at board level in addition.

Liaison would be preserved by a permanent consultative committee composed equally of senior accountants and Revenue personnel. Indeed, this committee should jointly examine the annual Budget in draft before its presentation to the country – a modus operandi to avoid the blunders of some Finance Acts better left unidentified. Its terms of reference would include Adam Smith's four classic canons of taxation, nowadays almost forgotten.

But only a profession strengthened, if not by complete integration then by a substantial measure of rationalization, can secure such improvements. When it can speak with one resolute voice, when any internal dissensions fade away, like Edgehill or Sedgemoor, when its corporate status is universally recognized, the vision will not be impossible.

A decade from now will our successors be enjoying the fruits of such an enlightened approach, or will they still be struggling with a burden of fiscal complexities?

of existing arrangements between retailers and petrol companies.

Part II of the undertakings ends restrictions both at company-owned stations and at independent stations which confine the retailer to the sale of particular brands of lubricants, kerosene and anti-freeze preparations. But restrictions are still permissible on the lubricants to be used in lubricating bays at company premises, or through lubricating equipment at company premises or independent sites where the equipment is furnished by the supplier. The equipment ties at independent sites are to be terminable.

Under Part III of the undertakings, a supplier will not participate in arrangements entitling him to a commission for the promotion of another company's brands of tyres, batteries and accessories by his solus retailers, tenants or licensees. Nor may he oblige a retailer to discriminate in the course of business between comparable goods of different brands.

Part IV of the undertakings provides that where an option to buy a filling station or a right of pre-emption has been granted as part of a loan arrangement connected with the laying, building or improvement of the station, such rights will be limited to the period for which the loan is outstanding.

The Statutory Order on Total Oil Products (G.B.) Ltd will require an affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament. Its effect will be to impose on that company restrictions comparable to those accepted by the other suppliers through voluntary undertakings which Total were not prepared to give. Those suppliers giving the undertakings did so on the understanding that all other petrol suppliers would be similarly affected.

Local Authority Borrowing

INCLUDED in the July issue of Financial Statistics, prepared by the Central Statistical Office, are figures of local authority borrowing and investments by financial institutions other than banks in the first quarter of this year.

Net borrowing by local authorities in the March quarter is shown to have totalled £282 million. Net long-term borrowing amounted to £348 million (including £179 million from the central Government and £52 million from the building societies), but there was a £66 million drop in temporary borrowing, contrary to the normal seasonal trend.

Allowing for seasonal variations the figures of total borrowing for the March quarter show a fall of £50 million compared with the last quarter of 1965.

Financial institutions other than banks acquired £345 million worth of securities in the March quarter, compared with £379 million in the previous one. These investments included £138 million of ordinary shares, £114 million of debentures, and £90 million of local authority securities.

Accountancy in the Shipyards

by J. L. STEWARD, F.C.A.

British Ship Research Association

THERE are special problems in the shipbuilding industry; it is open to the full force of international competition, some of it subsidized; it is a capital goods industry, at the mercy of the trade cycle; and demand can be distorted by political factors.

Shipbuilding is really a group of industries, the products being as diverse as steelwork, marine engines, electrical auxiliaries, and joinery and plumbing work. Some twenty trades are involved, and one of the major headaches is to ensure that all are kept in balance to ensure steady employment.

What then is the role of the accountant in such an industry and how can his technique help? Over the last twenty years the writer has attempted to apply orthodox techniques such as planning, budgetary control and a form of standard costing. It seemed to be more important to meet the needs of the moment than to apply theory, so that development was rather from the practical towards the textbook than in the reverse direction. Accountancy cannot be practised in isolation and to get anywhere at all it was necessary to work closely with the technical and production people.

From receipt of order to delivery of a ship normally takes something like eighteen months, so that a period of three to five years is necessary for forming a view of the finances. Programmes of modernization frequently involve very large sums and the anticipated return has to be calculated over periods of twenty or more years. The fact that contracts are long term does, however, facilitate planning and one can usually forecast turnover a year or more ahead. There is therefore not the same need for flexible budgeting as in other industries, even if such were practicable. An additional ship in a year can make a vast difference to the trading results, so that an analysis of overheads between fixed and variable is a matter of considerable importance. It has been found preferable, however, to make ad hoc investigations, rather than to build an automatic analysis into the costing system. In the short run most expenses tend to be fixed, and in the long run nearly all are variable.

In the day-to-day work, an attempt has been made to follow the cycle of 'plan, schedule and control'. These techniques are the essence of management, but they have to be carried out economically and there is no room for frills in a shipyard. It is impracticable, for example, to prepare bills of quantities in every detail before a tender for a ship is submitted. The technical calculations alone to decide the dimensions, deadweight, speed and power, etc., are monumental, although they are rapidly becoming less laborious with the increased use of computers. These have to be completed before pricing can start.

Planning

Before the Second World War, planning was relatively simple – it was based on the assumption that an abundance of labour was available when required. The men were organized in squads, they came when required, lifted reasonably high piece-work earnings – while they lasted – and moved on, frequently at only half a day's notice, when no longer required. Full employment has very properly changed all this and posed major problems for management. If labour is inadequately employed, the expense can be enormous; if it is dispensed with temporarily, it may never return. Not much imagination is needed to appreciate the sort of problems involved on completion of a passenger liner when there is no follow-on ship.

Planning starts with the erection sequence and the object is to see that the right material – neither more nor less – and the right labour are available when required. The technique of network analysis has come into quite common use in shipbuilding and there is little doubt that it pays dividends, particularly in keeping the finishing trades in balance.

Scheduling

Modern shipbuilding consists of burning (i.e. cutting) plates (in the most up-to-date yards by electronically-guided machines), forming them by rolls, presses, etc. – frequently into shapes of three dimensions – and assembling them into structures varying from fifteen to one hundred tons according to the limitations of the crane on the building berths. This prefabrication work is carried out in sheds where the facilities are better than on the berths and there is protection from the weather. Usually the structures, or 'units' as they are frequently termed, are processed through the sheds in groups of about four and these groups are convenient subdivisions for costing purposes.

The writer advocates a parts list for each unit, showing the operations on each plate and the routing to buffer stowage prior to assembly. An operations layout sheet is then drawn up, detailing the sequence of operations and grouping them into work packages of from one to three days' work for the preparation of job tickets.

Standard times should be fixed for each operation, as such times are the basis of all planning, control, and incentive schemes.

How, then, is the monumental task of fixing times for the million or more man-hours involved in building a ship to be tackled? Jobs have to be broken down into elements, and control restricted to essentials. A balance has to be struck between putting out times that have little meaning, and flooding the works with an army of rate-fixers that does not earn its keep. Method study is essential, but at the risk of being branded a reactionary the writer would be very sparing in the use of a stop watch. It is time enough to get down to minutes with a stop-watch when man-days – or even weeks – are eliminated by other means. In this context, activity sampling is possibly just as good a tool as detailed time study and it is cheaper. Representative samples, studied in depth, may very well reveal more than a general and more superficial study.

Similar procedures can be used for the finishing trades – joiners, plumbers, etc. If one is practical a sound basis for control can be laid, but if one is too theoretical as, for example, in insisting on a card for every trivial operation, the result can be a ghastly paper-chase leading nowhere.

Control

Having fixed the labour content, it is a matter of collecting a feed-back from the shops and particularly of spotlighting excess costs. As a general method the fairly common engineering practice of giving a man a card on commencing a job, taking it away on completion, and noting the time between start and completion is preferred, but there are circumstances where it is impracticable (because of the multitude of short jobs) and one has to substitute a count of finished work. There are other circumstances where it is pointless to attempt to collect detail.

The coding of job cards is best carried out in the planning office as only in this way can consistency and accuracy be ensured and a reliable base established for measuring excess costs. These take many forms, e.g. hold-ups for drawings or weather, additional runs of welding because of 'wide gaps', excess fairing (i.e. measures to ensure a good fix) and carrying out on the berth of work which should have been done in the sheds.

It has been found desirable to analyse labour costs against six main centres, namely:

- (1) preparation (mangling, shotblasting, paint spraying, etc.)
- (2) plate shop (burning, rolling, etc.)
- (3) assembly shop (main and sub-assembly)
- (4) building berth
- (5) shops for the finishing trades
- (6) afloat.

The labour totals are subdivided by operation as well as by trade. Examples of operations have already been given above in amplification of the description of centres. The number of operations runs to about a hundred headings and although this may sound complicated, it is not so in practice. It is a fairly simple matter to get the codes into job cards and to locate the necessary information as and when required.

Materials

The control of materials follows conventional lines, the object being to order the minimum quantities required from drawings. Steel is the main raw material and in order to control scrap it is advocated that gross and net weights be calculated before orders are placed. Timber, pipes and other materials are susceptible to control in differing degrees of detail.

Management information

The writer holds rather strong views on the subject of information for management. It is really no use churning out tabulations and computer print-outs by the square yard and expecting management to look at them. The short answer is they won't, and who blames them? A short statement with a clear message on a quarto sheet of paper is the ideal. The following are advocated:

1. Weekly

Statements of excess costs showing the department responsible, the department incurring the cost, brief details of the work, the reason for and amount of the expenditure.

A more or less conventional form of operating statement compiled from the completed job cards. Examples are shown on the following page.

2. Monthly

An up-to-date forecast of the anticipated result of every contract and the likely outcome of trading for as far ahead as the company is committed, or the position can be foreseen – normally this is two to five years.

3. Quarterly

Profit and loss account and balance sheet.

4. Sectional costs

The ship would be split into thirty or forty sections and as each section is completed the actual costs should be compared with original estimate (for contract purposes) and the later estimate made for control purposes. Such comparisons will give a pointer to the outcome of the contract and will reveal any lessons that have not been already picked up from the weekly operating statements.

It is not possible to generalize as to 'sections', either for fitting out or steelwork. Generally they follow holds, decks, etc. – but each ship requires individual treatment. The important point is to co-ordinate the work of the planning and costing departments and relate both to the requirements of production.

Inter-firm comparisons

Shipbuilders are interested to know how they compare with each other and it is an interesting study for a research organization to receive confidential returns from individual builders, to attempt to bring them to a common base and to put out general information, without breach of confidence, so that each builder can test his results against the general background. A ship can be anything from a passenger liner to a trawler or tug, but although the subject is still in its infancy, a rough yardstick has been evolved which produces meaningful figures, at any rate in terms of man-hour content of steelwork.

Computers

The advent of computers is revolutionizing our thinking in shipbuilding as in every other walk of life. Technical calculations which previously took man-weeks are now carried out in minutes, and plates that were laboriously hand-marked and burned are burnt automatically, sometimes four at a time, from tenth scale drawings or computer programs. The day when work content is calculated by computer from the basic technical data may not be as far off as one would have imagined a few years ago. A computer can give a degree of control not possible by any other means. The technique of network analysis has already been referred to.

It is possible to envisage calculation of delivery dates on varying assumptions as regards labour utilization. There can be five levels, namely (a) normal staff working normal hours; (b) normal staff working two nights per week overtime; (c) the same, working a given number of Sundays; (d) additional labour which may not be of the highest quality; and finally (e) in certain circumstances, sub-contracting. Four of these levels involve premium cost. Greater accuracy in forecasting delivery dates and the premium costs involved and in working out the minimum overtime (in certain trades) to keep the yard in balance, are fertile fields for the employment of a computer.

It is in an extension of the control functions that a computer will pay for itself in shipbuilding, rather than in taking over such routine functions as payroll, invoice analysis, and so forth. One thing is certain, as other writers have pointed out, careful preparation and a clear idea of objectives are a pre-essential to success.

The future

This article is on accountancy rather than shipbuilding, but in view of the topicality of the subject perhaps a few sentences on the Geddes Report may not be amiss. They are personal opinions for which no one but the writer has any responsibility.

In the main the diagnosis is accurate, although one wonders whether adequate weight has been given to the effect of political factors such as Suez, or whether even in this post-Keynes era one can dismiss the trade cycle in such words as 'There are good reasons for believing that this growing market will be more stable than in the past.'

The market for ships will no doubt grow with population and the rise in the standard of living, particularly among the peoples of the East, but Britain's share of that market will be dependent on ability to build as cheaply as others. The report does not give much authoritative guidance on the disparity between British and best foreign results, particularly in direct labour cost.

Larger shipbuilding units are obviously desirable, but size and efficiency are not necessarily synonymous; and before amalgamations take place it will surely be necessary to show in detail how the group will operate more economically than the parts. There must be some reservations about the technique of shot-gun marriages.

A loan at Government rate of borrowing is not the most appetizing of carrots and the outright payments are not large in relation to the problems.

The problems of British shipbuilding constitute a challenge, alike to its technical and administrative staffs, and one that may very well be a test case for the nation. There is a large and growing part for its accountants to play and there are plenty of problems on which they can sharpen their wits.

The Co-ordination of Finance and Management – II

by F. T. HUNTER, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A., M.I.M.C.

VIII. Planning ahead

FROM what has been said in this paper so far it is hoped that a clear expression of belief in planning ahead has emerged. In the early days of management accounting the emphasis was on control, and it is perhaps not an exaggeration to say that it was by no means unknown for great effort to be put into attempts to control something that had not been thought out at all clearly or comprehensively. In other words no real co-ordination of finance and management had been attempted.

58. This has changed and the emphasis is now on planning. The planning must be careful and comprehensive and must pay due regard to the views of all management. This sounds as though the planning procedure is a lengthy affair with Uncle Tom Cobley and all airing views of doubtful use, leading to a total lack of decision. This should not be so. There should be one executive in a small business, up to a small committee in a large business, charged with the duty of listening to one and all (at the right levels), weighing up the pros and cons and producing in due course a balanced sensible plan and budget. You chat to the yard labourer for the gossip, but not for worth-while views on next year's production programme.

59. Coupled with a controlled planning procedure must be a readiness to abandon plans which have become obsolete or are manifestly wrong. There is a strong belief that a plan once made must be adhered to at all costs, or the whole value of planning control is lost. This is a distortion. There is a world of difference between the alteration of a plan and the maintenance of an original budget with changes of plan shown as variances due to such change, in order to show clearly each period what effect on the original budgeted profit and loss account the change has had. One can argue a set of circumstances where changes of plan, while inevitable, have become so drastic as to demand a completely new set of budgets, but these situations are rare.

60. A change of considerable significance which also took place was the realization that the struggle to ascertain the cost of a product was usually an unrewarding one. What was important was to set standards for, and thereafter control, the performance of the factory, or whatever the business was. If this was done carefully and comprehensively, the cost of products could be ascertained as a by-product through the technique of standard costing. The basic theory was that if the production or service processes were technically sound and cost the right sums of money the cost of the product was bound to be right. There are cases, of course, where standard product costing can't be done but this is not the place to discuss how to deal with this situation.

61. In a comparatively short paper it is not possible to spell out the detail of a planning, co-ordinating and controlling procedure, which would be the subject of a 300-page book. But it is possible to say what in broad outline has to be done. The various factors do not apply to all businesses, of course, and the following remarks will apply therefore where appropriate.

62. There are the following main functions in the majority of businesses.

Research and development.

Marketing (includes research and selling).

Production.

Personnel.

Secretarial and finance (these are often separated).

In some businesses the production function is the provision of a service. Think of an accountant's office where there is not an end-product in the sense of an article for sale, but there are the values of all the hours of technical expertise applied to various assignments. But in an accountant's office there are many other functions.

63. Each one of the functions has to be planned in itself, but also has to be related to each of the other functions.

Research will demand, inter alia:

- (a) perhaps a laboratory;
- (b) some technical plant;
- (c) some technical experts;

---

The concluding part of a paper presented at the recent Oxford Summer Course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

- (d) some degree of freedom to explore, without any very clear object in view.

Marketing (including sales) will, inter alia:

- (a) plan field research;
- (b) plan product acceptability testing;
- (c) plan sales of existing products;
- (d) plan distribution;
- (e) plan advertising.

Production will, inter alia:

- (a) plan the production of saleable end-products;
- (b) plan the day-by-day piece production on the individual departments;
- (c) buy materials;
- (d) plan for new plant;
- (e) study methods and set standards;
- (f) control actual manufacture.

Personnel will, inter alia:

- (a) recruit and train employees;
- (b) keep records, e.g. National Insurance or P.A.Y.E.;
- (c) deal with grievances or personnel difficulties;
- (d) maintain safety.

Secretarial and finance will, inter alia:

- (a) keep accounts:
  - (i) statutory;
  - (ii) management;
- (b) control costs;
- (c) calculate and pay wages and salaries;
- (d) prepare routine and ad hoc reports;
- (e) assist in settling budgets;
- (f) co-ordinate everyone else into a coherent picture.

Some twenty-five subsidiary functions have been listed and there are many more. But enough have been listed to suggest that the co-ordination procedure cannot always be easy. But co-ordinated they must be for there to be a smooth running enterprise.

64. Every one of the functions has an effect on every other one. At the end of the planning exercise there must be a cash budget or plan. There will be five basic plans, one for each main function, and subsidiary plans for each subsidiary function, and a manual of budgets when completed for a fair-sized business will be a fair-sized manual. Someone has to put it all together and see if it fits. This task falls usually to the financial controller. He has a staff set up to do it; nobody can operate without money; only the controller can say whether the money will be there, and most of what management want the controller wants.

65. The fitting together may take a long time, and plans have to be changed frequently until there is a sensible coherent picture. It is a little like struggling with a jig-saw puzzle made of soft rubber pieces which change shape constantly and rapidly. But it can be done and is done, every day in thousands of enterprises with considerable success. The budget manual, which is the place where the whole story is contained, is the work of many people, and is the end, or start, whichever way it is looked at, of the co-ordination process. Each executive has put on paper his plans, these have been put against the other executive's plans, and the controller has added them up and said that the cash income planned is sufficient for the outgo planned or is deficient. If it is deficient decisions have to be taken, on what is to be altered, or where and how the cash shortage can be raised.

66. The controller will, of course, have looked at all the plans critically to satisfy himself, so far as he can, that production capacities are being properly utilized, that current manning looks sensible, that plans for expansion involving more manpower fit into the local supply position, that plans for capital expenditure are dated sensibly so that money is not frozen too soon, that planned outputs bear a relationship to past experience and are not obvious wild guesses, and similar kinds of critical appraisal. He has to be tactful in any comments he may make as a result of such appraisals but they have to be done by someone and the financial controller is usually the man who does them even though his mouth-piece may be the managing director.

IX. New techniques

67. What has been said in the previous section can be summarized into the following steps:

- (a) a statement of the future plans in physical terms, e.g.:
  - volumes and mix of sales;
  - volumes and mix of production;
  - manpower required;
  - new plant required;
- (b) a re-statement of those plans in the resulting financial terms;
- (c) a statement of plans for administration and services in financial terms;
- (d) a putting-together and balancing of the plans. Some things viable financially may not be physically and vice versa, and a re-shaping is required;
- (e) an acceptance by all of the master plan;
- (f) a setting-up of control procedures to give warning of things not going to plan with, wherever possible, reasons and indications of corrective actions.

68. It became obvious in the past, as was mentioned earlier, that some of the apparent plans were not being well based and managers found that their knowledge of how their business operated was not always very profound. Their ideas of how it ought to operate were often even dimmer. Over the years and particularly in very recent years, new techniques have been developed to do two basic things:

- (a) to find out what ought to be done, and
- (b) to facilitate the correct performance of what it has been decided to do.

69. The earliest real attempts to do this started as budgetary control (coupled very often with standard costing), and out of this new accounting approach developed what is now called 'management accounting'. In essence management accounting is a re-presentation of existing accounting information in a manner which is helpful to management in its day-to-day operations, and which attempts to say (a) what should be done, and (b) what is, in fact, done. But herein lies much of the difficulty, and one of the major reasons why budgetary control is sometimes rejected by management. It cannot, without something much more searching, say what really ought to be done.

70. There were further attempts to improve and responsibility accounting was invented. This broke a business down into small bits, each bit being the responsibility of one executive, be he a manager at high level or a foreman at a lower level. This was an improvement but all the time there was not a real answer to 'What should be done'. Managements were constantly seeking better ways of looking ahead and assessing what the foreseeable future looked like, and, more important, what did the apparent unknown look like, if it could be made to be not quite so unknown.

71. There were several other accounting techniques, each with their staunch supporters, each with their detractors; such techniques as marginal costing, opportunity costing, commitment accounting, and others. But all lacked something, and that something was in the past difficult to elucidate. Almost anything can be done, given time, and this was lacking. To solve some of the worrying problems took so long that the information when produced was out of date and useless.

72. The advent of electronic data processing (computers and all that) began to spur new thinking onwards. What had been too lengthy to do was now possible, and the last few years have seen immense strides in both planning and controlling.

73. In the planning field it is now quite common for businesses to use one or other or all of such techniques as:

Economic surveys

These surveys cover the economics of the business itself, and the economics of the trade it thinks, or hopes, it is in. That is not by any means an idle crack. Many enterprises are not at all clear about what it is sensible or possible for them to be doing.

Critical path analysis

Used extensively for individual projects but also has wide uses in day-to-day planning. The technique takes a project to pieces and sorts out the priorities and order and dates in which and by which things must be done.

Operation research

Analysing a business and finding out what does make it tick, what would happen if this or the other were done. It is a mathematical technique used to find out the best course to follow.

Sampling

A common statistical technique again used to say what is the best thing to do or what does happen.

Inter-firm comparisons

Finding out, by the use of some operating ratios, what competitors are doing and where weaknesses exist.

Discounted cash flow

A technique for appraising the relative worth of alternative courses of action by valuing at today's value the cash return to be obtained from each.

Computers have enabled very searching, extensive work of this kind to be done which would have been quite impracticable a few years ago.

74. In the controlling field two major techniques have been developed which have been of immense value.

Feed back

This technique does exactly what it says and 'feeds back' information all the time to critical control points of what is happening so that constant corrections are being made to prevent processes and procedures going wrong. It is probably obvious that this technique has vast uses in tape-controlled machine tools and similar applications.

Real time

This somewhat unrealistic expression means that the provision of information, and particularly control information, is instantaneous, or as nearly so as can be contrived. Clearly such a technique has immense value in running businesses. The value of the answer now and not in a fortnight, and the 'now' really being 'now' as the event takes place, does not need stressing.

Again, computers, and electronic devices, have made these developments possible. All are designed to answer one or other or both of two questions.

- (a) What should be done in some given circumstances?
- (b) What should the circumstances be?

75. All these techniques are closely bound up with co-ordinating finance and management. Everything done ends up as finance sooner or later and the faster that control information can be produced and assessed usually means that the money can be made to go further and do more because the general picture is that much clearer. Few businesses are in the happy position of having so much finance that anything can be done without having to plan it. Techniques such as operation research, feed back and the others enables the available finance to be used more effectively, and often sooner.

X. Role of management

76. Any management, as a broad generalization, follows much the same sort of organizational structure with a policy-making board, a managing director, and echelons of managers and supervisors. The management at all levels always has a dual role to fulfil. It has to weigh up the evidence and make decisions, and then has to act upon those decisions.

77. Most of the decisions have a profound effect on finance, and end as entries in the books somewhere. The decisions are of two basic kinds:

- (a) Regular routine – e.g. sales prices, manpower, production quantities.
- (b) Ad hoc – e.g. purchase of new plant, market research (could be regular routine also).

Any one of the decisions should first be a budget, and then figure almost certainly as part of the control mechanisms.

The actions have similar effects and will, in their financial aspect, figure as part of the 'actuals' set against the budget. This is what Brech calls the inter-function of finance and management.

78. Management has the diagnostic roles, the research, the thoughts about the future, probing markets, developing new products, and also has the control roles, seeing that the enterprise does what it should, or what is thought that it should.

Finance has, to a large extent, the reporting roles, finding out what happened as compared with what should happen; and an advisory role, telling management what it should do. Managements argue about this vehemently and say that finance does no such thing and is a mere recorder of events. In modern management, however, that is not any longer true. Finance does advise and does say what should be done. But it is very easy to think of cases where management has a reporting role and finance has a diagnostic role and the remarks above are only meant as broad generalizations.

79. In thinking about management decisions a point of importance is to remember that the level where a policy decision is taken is not always the level where the resultant action is taken and not always the level where the reporting is done. This brings one back to the point of trying to allow those who have to do things to have had a say in what should be done, or at least be clear why something is being done.

Regular meetings (these don't occupy half as much time as the chaos resulting from no meetings). Clear minutes of actions to be taken, and regular follow-up of the decisions are most valuable parts of the management function, and will usually be found in any well-knit management structure.

Communications are of the utmost importance and it should never be forgotten that these are two-way, up and down. Don't make your communications mere channels for passing orders downwards. Listen to the messages coming up, or if they don't come up, go down to the lower levels and find out why.

XI. Degree of detail

80. One of the commonest cries heard from managements is 'We have far too many controls and reports'. But, however true this may be in some cases, some controls and reports there must be. Is it possible to draw up blue-prints of what there should be? Almost certainly it is not possible.

There are small simple companies that need small simple controls. There are small complex companies that need large complex controls. There are large simple companies that need small simple controls. There are large complex companies that need large complex controls, and there are all the variations of grey in between the black and white of 'small simple' and 'large complex'.

81. How far ahead should the financial control go? Without any doubt at all there should be a short-term form of control for, say, a year ahead and a long-term control for as far ahead as anything approaching sensible plans can be made. These should be all-embracing and should take into account such things as world demand, politics, labour relations and so on.

Small companies probably tend not to plan ahead very far but giants plan ahead for five, ten, even twenty years.

82. It has been assumed that the readers of this paper are familiar with the basic techniques of budgetary control and management accounting and no attempt has been made to spell out the precise detail of specific routines. But there are some general points which can be mentioned as being of importance.

XII. Standards

83. One of them which is discussed endlessly is what sort of standards should be used in setting up the basic control. Should they be ideal or realistic? That is to say, should they be the best performance that can be attained under the most favourable circumstances possible or should they be standards which it is expected can be attained during a specific future period? Should they be basic, i.e. a standard established for use unaltered over a long period of time – or current, a standard established for use over a short period of time and related to current conditions? (Both these definitions come from An Introduction to Cost Accountancy by Warwick Dobson.)

The answer to these questions is not always easy and it does depend on circumstances. For some purposes a basic standard is required, but for day-to-day control probably a current standard suits better. On the other hand it is fairly safe to assert that very seldom would an ideal standard be very helpful.

84. Whatever is adopted it is essential that a constant review of the standards being used should be built into the scheme. Such things as methods, manpower, speeds, should be under constant survey. If a change becomes necessary, tomorrow is not necessarily the right timing, but the reason for delaying a change should be recognized and recorded.

85. Another source of endless discussion is how far down should the delving go to establish the plans. Without any doubt the delving should be deep. Almost always plans made as a result of surface-scratching turn out to be bad plans, and to have ignored, because of ignorance, some important and vital factors. To ignore something because it is judged to be unimportant is very different from ignoring something because of ignorance as to its existence.

86. The great competition introduced by machinery and the application of the sub-division of labour, render it continually necessary for each producer to be on watch, to discover improved methods by which the cost of each article can be reduced, and with this in view, it is of great importance to know the precise expense of every process. That statement was made, surprisingly, by Mr C. Babbage in 1832 in an article 'Economy of Manufacture'. How very much truer it is today.

87. Mr A. G. Norman, of De La Rue, at the B.I.M. conference in March 1966, said: 'In examining the past in order to draw conclusions for future action we are convinced that most of our failures can be traced back to the paucity and poor quality of the information available to management at the time of decision, to poor evaluation techniques and to cumbersome and inefficient monitoring and control procedures.'

XIII. Small businesses

88. Do small businesses need something less than or something different from the needs of large businesses? Is the co-ordination of finance and management any different in the basic essentials in a small business?

These questions are of importance to many practitioners who have to advise their clients, and there is no easy answer to either.

89. If it is accepted that there are small complex companies which require large complex controls one must accept that each case has to be considered on its merits.

90. There are many small companies which require the services of a really competent chief accountant but only require them one day a week, just as there are many small companies which require the services five days a week.

But there are many small companies where the requirements from the accountant in terms of technical expertise are not high.

91. However, there is no justification for saying that the small simple businesses do not need to worry about planning and controlling, and can muddle along from day to day happily and successfully. This just is not true.

The horizon may be close, the products may be few, but the basic problems are there.

92. A small local mineral water company has planning and marketing problems just like 'You know who'. They are smaller in scope and probably less inherently complicated but they are there. But it would hardly be expected that a high-powered market research survey was needed. 'You know who' doubtless needs one in a big way, however, and sees that it gets it.

93. Basically, any business regardless of size needs:

- (a) Budgetary control and perhaps standard costing if appropriate.
- (b) A market survey, even if only the boss touring the district in his car using his eyes.
- (c) Some product research, in terms of:
  - (i) design;
  - (ii) manufacturing method;
  - (iii) material.
- (d) Some production planning and control.

94. No manufacturing business can be run properly without these basics. As the business grows in size the complications grow and the techniques required become more refined and more comprehensive.

In the smaller businesses it would be less usual to find critical path analysis, value analysis, operation research and such things in use or perhaps even necessary.

95. But these are generalizations. There are many small businesses of such a nature as to demand all the techniques, and to demand them in considerable detail and frequency.

96. It is not possible to relate size of operation to technique required. As a broad principle it is degree of complexity which determines the technique.

Mere volume may call for some accounting machines or even a computer, but mere volume would seldom of itself call for operation research.

XIV. The professional accountant

97. This paper has probably fallen into the trap of talking solely about the financial controller and giving the impression that only the accountant in an industrial post is concerned with the subject of it. This is quite untrue. More and more is the practising accountant drawn into the day-to-day business life of his clients. No longer is he in attendance once per annum to conduct an audit and maybe prepare a set of annual accounts. His advice is constantly sought on a wide variety of topics, and these topics are not by any means confined to pure finance. The scope of advice and service now offered is wide, and any business of any importance demands and gets from its accountant expertise undreamt of a few years ago.

98. Many of the practising accountants wear two hats – a public accountant's and a consultant's. Many practise as consultants only, many have gone into non-accountant consultant companies. Whichever way they do it, they expect to be asked to assist in the co-ordination process talked about in this paper, as well as to assist in many other things, and have as a consequence organized themselves to provide the answers and the assistance asked for.

XV. The social implications of control

99. Should the finance function only be concerned with a cold-blooded look at hard economic facts? This paper has throughout probably suggested just that, but is this really true? This is a very wide subject and is doubtless one which is not easy to resolve.

Mr Brech is quite clear in his view. He says:

'However stringently applied is the principle of private enterprise in any society, the inescapable fact remains that industry and commerce are essential elements in the pattern of economic activity of that society, integral factors in its livelihood. Management cannot, therefore, avoid, however little it may choose overtly to recognize – that its responsibility for industrial and commercial direction is first and foremost a responsibility to society.'

He does go on to say that this view will not be popular with many practising managers and will be regarded as uncomfortably left-wing by many. This he rejects, however, categorically; and probably few would sustain for very long or very vehemently a view that 'anything goes' if immediately profitable, no matter how damaging to the community.

(Concluded.)

Third South African National Congress

THE Third National Congress of Chartered Accountants (S.A.) held in Cape Town at the end of April was declared a remarkable success in every way. Sponsored by the Joint Council of the Societies of Chartered Accountants of South Africa, the chairman of which, Mr H. Palmer Strachan, C.A.(S.A.), acted as Congress President, the Congress was attended by over four hundred members, many of whom were accompanied by their ladies for whom a special programme of tours, visits and other entertainment had been arranged. Vice-President of the Congress was Mr H. Duncan Wright, C.A.(S.A.), A.C.W.A., Vice-Chairman of the Joint Council and President of the Cape Society of Accountants and Auditors.

The Congress was held at the University of Cape Town, situated on the lower slopes of Table Mountain in the midst of most beautiful and impressive scenery, to which it was welcomed by Professor Douglas Inskip, the Vice-Principal.

The three papers presented, all dealing with subjects of vital importance to the accountancy profession at the present time and summarized below, gave rise to lengthy deliberations in seminar groups and lively discussions. Always a popular feature of these congresses is a general forum at which questions on points of professional interest are discussed by a panel. The chairman, Mr G. W. Cox, F.C.A., C.A.(S.A.), C.A.(S.R.), managed to induce the panel members to give reasonable answers to some very knotty problems.

Finance Minister's speech

Of the many enjoyable social functions arranged during the week, the highlight was the banquet at which the guest of honour was Dr the Hon. T. E. Dönges, Minister of Finance. In his speech he referred to the pleasant relations existing between his department and the accountancy profession, and went on to discuss the duties of auditors of financial institutions as compared with those of companies. 'The function of an auditor of a financial institution is so important', he said, 'that I consider it necessary to emphasize his responsibilities to the public. The Registrar of Financial Institutions has been appointed to protect the interests of depositors, policy-holders and the general public, but his position is strengthened if he can rely on the auditing profession.'

In the case of banks and building societies, the auditor is required to report to the Registrar any 'material irregularity or undesirable practice in the conduct of the business which has come to his notice'; and in the case of insurance companies, 'any irregularity of which, in his capacity as auditor, he has cause to complain'. The words 'undesirable practice', said the Minister, constitute a significant extension of the duties of an auditor.

Section 37 (2) of the Banking Act calls for an extension of the auditor's report by requiring him to state 'whether the control of the company over its branches is adequate and whether its instructions to its employees in its branches and agencies have been properly carried out'. 'Does this', asked Dr Dönges, 'in no way qualify the contention that management, and management alone, is responsible for the introduction and application of an effective internal control system?' He concluded by saying that there was a challenge for the creative ability of the accountant in making company statements clearer and more meaningful.

The accountant of tomorrow

The first paper was presented by Mr John W. Queenan, B.S.(ILL.), C.P.A., a former President of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants. His subject, 'The accountant of tomorrow', gave him the occasion to speak in challenging terms of some of the great opportunities for service which the accountants of the future must be prepared to take in a dynamic world.

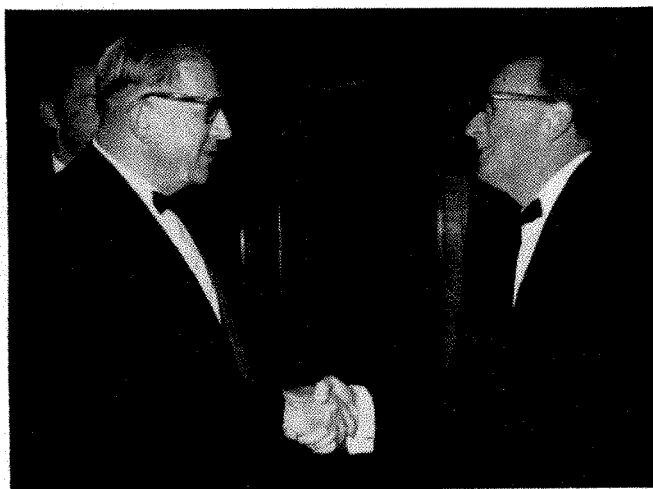

The continually changing environment due to social and political trends and rapid technological advances, was leading to a general increase in the need for all the services now rendered by the accountant. And an expansion of these, as well as new demands, would occur, particularly in auditing, taxation and management advice. Various factors were extending the 'attest' function - i.e. the giving of an independent opinion on financial statements - into new areas; in labour disputes and wage negotiations; in the determination of public utility rates; and in the field of management performance generally.

Tax services

An increase in all the forms of tax service now given by accountants was to be expected, and the need for constructive tax planning for clients was likely to continue at an accelerated pace. In a wider context, accountants should be able to play a part in formulating tax policy, in evaluating the implications of specific tax provisions for the economy as a whole, and in appraising the efficacy of the administrative procedure.

Management advisory services

Management services were a natural growth from competent audit service. Small businesses in particular needed advice, and there was an immense field for assisting clients in the use of accounting data and techniques of planning and control. Distribution was likely to require increasing attention by both management and accountants.

Future problems

In order to be ready to meet the tremendous challenge of the future, accountants must establish better relations with the general public and closer connections with lawyers, bankers, financial executives, and investment analysts. One of the most effective public relations instruments was competent professional performance by each individual accountant, and the boundaries of competence must be pushed back as rapidly as possible. Research would open the way to progress, particularly to internationally-accepted accounting and auditing standards and principles. Statistical sampling would undoubtedly become a standard auditing tool.

Education and ethics

Accountants of the future would require a more liberal education to enable them to recognize new problems and to generate new solutions, as well as greatly increased technical knowledge. They also had to recognize their interdependence and their obligation to their fellow accountants in matters relating to competence, independence, and participation in civic and professional affairs. Accountants with recognized qualifications must move simultaneously towards raising the level of as many less qualified accountants as possible.

The trend towards expansion in large corporations was accompanied by the growth of large accounting firms. Large companies were developing into organizations with a world outlook, and world accountancy must move forward on the basis of honest sharing and mutual understanding to serve society to an extent unmatched in the past.

Preparation and presentation of accounting statements for management

In the second paper to be presented, Mr A. M. Rosholt, C.A.(S.A.), said that budgeting was now a recognized part of company management but the emphasis had tended to be chiefly on profitability, and a number of factors in the economy at the present time strongly underlined the importance of budgeting for present and future financial requirements. The specific budgets dealt with by the speaker related to: (1) long-range forecasts; (2) capital expenditure; (3) profits; (4) cash flow.

General benefits

In summarizing the benefits which budgeting should help to achieve, he said: (a) in the long term it set down the anticipated course and targets of the company and ensured that all policy decisions were kept within the limits of the long-term objectives; (b) in the short term it showed what the profits were likely to be and the consequent effect on the company's financial structure; (c) when broken down into areas of responsibility, it formed a most useful control tool for management over the people responsible for those areas, and brought into the company the essential teamwork between management and staff; (d) if subsequent results did not measure up to the original estimates, it made management aware far sooner of trends detrimental to the business.

Cash-flow budget

Among other things, the cash-flow budget gave management a reasonably accurate idea of what the financial requirements were likely to be at the projected level of trading, and also gave advance warning when a more permanent form of borrowing was likely to be required, i.e. medium- or long-term loans. It had to be emphasized that the value of budgeting would be lost unless budgets were intelligently and analytically compared with actual results on a monthly basis. The quarterly review was of great importance, and any significant variation of a permanent character in the monthly comparisons had to be investigated and its effect on the new budget measured.

The use of graphs, which eliminated much of the detail contained in budgets and returns, could be very helpful to managements in presenting a clear picture of current trends and future probabilities.

Regular reviews required

When a comprehensive system of accounting statements covering both budgets and returns was first introduced, a great deal of time and thought was necessarily devoted to the types and forms of statements required for efficient management and control, but it could not be expected that these statements would remain adequate for ever. It was essential to examine, on an annual basis, the activities of the company which might well be changing, and to decide whether adequate information was available to management on all important sections of the business. The statements in force should then be analysed in detail to ensure that they meet fully the present requirements of all levels of management. This examination would also reveal whether any of the information being supplied could be discarded without loss.

A graduate profession

In the final paper of the Congress, Mr Richard G. Wuth, F.S.A.A., C.A.(S.R.), C.A.(S.A.), referred first to the opinion held by many that present-day programmes for the education and training of accountants were in urgent need of review and revision. He reviewed briefly the place which a university degree should have in the profession's education plans, and the part which universities could play in those plans. He strongly maintained that academic study and practical experience were inseparable and must be properly integrated at all stages if optimum success was to result.

After dealing with some of the criticisms levelled at accountants, especially by economists and some members of the profession itself, that they took a too short-sighted view of the possible applications of their knowledge and skill, Mr Wuth discussed the pattern of education and training in South Africa. Here he found some matters for criticism, although the profession in that country had gone a very long way towards dependence upon the universities to provide academic teaching. There was not sufficient time for research or for the application of principles to practical problems in properly controlled conditions. All too often there was a complete lack of co-ordination between academic studies and examples in practice.

The speaker briefly outlined the education and training programmes in other countries and described some of the suggestions made in a report by a special subcommittee of the Education Committee of the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board of South Africa in 1962. He drew a number of important conclusions, foremost among them being that the only real solution was for the profession to determine its academic requirements and to look to the universities to provide these through the medium of an appropriate degree course. The objects of a period of service in a practising accountant's office would then be primarily to develop good professional behaviour, to provide opportunities to apply academic knowledge in practice, and also opportunities to get acquainted with the various areas in the field of accountancy. He thought it reasonable to assume that a comprehensive degree course for accountants would require four university years. Such a course injected into a five-year training programme would not immediately produce skilled accountants but young qualified men ready to profit from experience.

In order to protect the public and the profession against immaturity and inexperience, he suggested that no graduate accountant should be permitted to practise unless he could show that he had had an additional, say, two years of suitable service as a qualified accountant in the office of a public accountant.

Insistence upon a university degree would in itself make the profession more attractive to the class of students it needed so badly, while an improvement in the public image of the profession might lead to greater Government aid, grants, bursaries, etc.

British Printing Corporation

THE celebrated issue between The British Printing Corporation Ltd and its former chairman is still readily enough in mind to need no 'recap' here. Note 11 to the accounts, from which this week's reprint is taken, puts the position in a nutshell and the kernel is supplied by the qualifications made by the joint auditors in their report.

The new chairman, Sir Walter Worboys, begins his review with the accounts by putting the facts behind the 1965 figures. Turnover was up from £41,870,000 to £50,514,000. If allowance is made for the turnover of Thomson Printers Ltd of £4,096,000 – the results of which were consolidated from January 1st, 1965 – and for the turnover of acquisitions only partially consolidated in 1964 and other acquisitions in 1965, then the 1965 turnover was about 7 per cent higher than 1964.

The profit of £950,002 against £1,757,450 is in line with earlier forecasts – the main causes, apart from reduced profit margins, being increased depreciation and higher bank and loan interest payments. The increased depreciation reflects a rise of about £7 million in fixed assets employed. There was no material change in depreciation rates.

Asset review

The higher assets reflect the inclusion of Thomson Printers as well as considerable direct expenditure by the group on buildings and plant. As the joint auditors state in their report and as the directors state in theirs, there is in hand a comprehensive review of all group assets, and what balance sheet adjustments are considered necessary will be made when the review is completed.

Meanwhile, the figure of £8,032,000 described in the 1964 accounts as 'Goodwill arising on consolidation' has, this year, been more accurately described as 'Excess of cost over the net book amount of assets in subsidiaries acquired and now figures at £8,370,000 – subject, in due course, to any adjustment which may be necessary under the assets review.

The balance sheet indicates a tight financial position, taking the level of bank borrowing and capital spending commitments into account. At the end of 1965, capital commitments totalled £2,360,000 and the chairman says that further capital expenditure on essential plant and buildings will be sanctioned this year totalling approximately £1 million.

The cash flow in 1965 was about £2,300,000 and this figure, shareholders are told, can be maintained in 1966 from depreciation alone, irrespective of the level of retained profits.

Bank arrangements

All quoted investments are being sold and also minority holdings and other assets of no direct trading interest. Receipts from these sources are expected to amount to £1 million but no sales of major trading assets are currently contemplated. An overall borrowing facility of £20 million has been negotiated with the company's bankers, Westminster, National Provincial, and District.

As part of these arrangements, charges are to be given over the assets of all the companies in the group. This will require adjustments to the terms of existing loan and preference stocks. The chairman reports that discussions are proceeding with the company's brokers and with representatives of institutional investors concerned. Holders of the 6½ per cent convertible loan stock and of the preference capital, together with holders of the two loan stocks in Hazell Sun, will be asked to sanction the adjustments soon.

So far as current trading is concerned, group sales are running about 7 per cent up on 1965 but there is excess capacity in several sections of the printing industry with consequent pressure on margins. All being well, however, 1966 profits are expected to get back to near the 1964 level.

In certain minor instances cost includes assets at professional valuations.

7. Stock and Work in Progress

Stock and work in progress is stated at the lower of cost and net realisable value.

8. Capital Contracts

Contracts for capital expenditure not provided for in the accounts are estimated at £2,360,000 for the Group (1964 £1,770,000). The British Printing Corporation Limited has no capital contracts but is committed to the acquisition of two further subsidiaries as explained in Note 1.

9. Contingent Liabilities

Group contingent liabilities amount to £762,000 (1964 £972,000).

The British Printing Corporation Limited has guaranteed the overdraft of a subsidiary to the extent of £8,750,000 the whole of which was utilised as at the 31st December 1965.

Under a provision in the agreement for the purchase of the 60% interest in Thomson Printers Limited, The British Printing Corporation Limited agreed that should the Thomson Organisation Limited wish to dispose, within one month after the end of a period of two years from the date of issue, of all or any of the ordinary shares of The British Printing Corporation Limited issued to it as purchase consideration, The British Printing Corporation Limited should pay in cash for each share the difference between the selling price and twenty shillings. If the selling price exceeds twenty shillings for each share The British Printing Corporation Limited is entitled to one half of the excess in cash.

The purchase consideration was satisfied by the issue of 2,160,000 shares on the 2nd July 1965 (Note 1).

10. Conversion of Overseas Currencies

The trading results, fixed and current assets and liabilities of overseas subsidiaries have been converted into sterling at the rate of exchange ruling at the 31st December 1965.

11. Legal Proceedings

Legal proceedings have been commenced in relation to a number of transactions entered into by Purnell and Sons Limited and its subsidiary company, Paulton Holdings Ltd, during the year ended the 31st December 1965 and previous years in which a former director was concerned. It is not yet possible to assess what amounts, if any, may be recovered as a result of these proceedings.

THE BRITISH PRINTING CORPORATION LIMITED

Report of the Auditors

To the Members of The British Printing Corporation Limited

The balance sheet of the company set out on pages [not reproduced] is in agreement with the books. We have obtained the information and explanations that we required with the exception of information and explanations relating to transactions entered into by a subsidiary company, Purnell and Sons Limited, and its subsidiary company, Paulton Holdings Limited, during the year ended 31st December 1965 and previous years in which a former director was concerned. As stated in note 11 on page [above] legal proceedings have been taken in relation to a number of transactions. It is not yet possible to assess what amounts, if any, may be recovered as a result of these proceedings. For these reasons we are not satisfied that the cost of subsidiaries shown in the balance sheet at £23,478,430 is correctly stated. We are also not satisfied that this book value is fully justified by the earnings of the subsidiaries or by the value of their underlying net assets. As stated in the directors' report on these accounts, it is the directors' intention to undertake a comprehensive review of all group assets in 1966 and to make such adjustments as they consider necessary in the balance sheet when the review is completed. Any adjustments of book values of assets would affect the figure of £3,370,375 at which the excess of cost over the net book amounts of assets in subsidiaries acquired is entered in the consolidated balance sheet.

Subject to these remarks in our opinion the books have been properly kept and the accounts set out on pages 6 to 15 [some not reproduced] comply with the Companies Act, 1948 and give a true and fair view of the state of affairs and the profit of the company and the group.

CITY NOTES

FROM the standpoint of the City, the Government is still tackling the most delicate part of its new economic measures – namely, making them bite in the way in which they are intended. The most ticklish part will be applying the six months' freeze on wages, for as has been seen already, this is causing considerable unease among the unions.

One favourable factor in the past week has been the knowledge that the United States 'Fed' has been solidly behind both the £ and the Government's measures. That has apparently impressed overseas opinion but clearly all the measures must be seen to work, and to be capable of being fully implemented, before the much looked for return of confidence becomes apparent.

FOR the London Stock Exchange, conditions have been settling down into a more normal pattern but it is still extremely difficult to assess the long-term prospects of individual shares.

The effect of tax increases, such as those brought about by selective employment tax, can be calculated but the run-down in business which stiffer credit restrictions, higher purchase tax, and limited hire-purchase facilities will bring about is a vastly different thing.

The Government has asked for a dividend freeze and from the speeches of chairmen at recent company meetings there are not many anyway who would be contemplating increases under present conditions. It seems that growth investment, as such, is going to be very limited.

Such conditions are likely to exert a two-way pull on the market. On the one hand there will be the ordinary investor who, seeing growth at a standstill, may elect to sell and invest elsewhere for the current high yields brought about by the 7 per cent Bank rate. On the other hand, however, the institutions are on the look-out for franked income – that on which corporation tax has already been paid – and they could consider current yields reasonable for the long term.

It remains to be seen which proves the stronger, though at the moment selling has been relatively small and marked-down prices may well be due for further technical improvement in conditions of small business turnover.

FOR those looking for pure return, there is no lack of avenues for the full 8 per cent yield is now established on debenture issues.

The line of waiting borrowers is expected to move along quickly despite the high rates necessary to obtain success, and so far about half a dozen are either on, or about to come to, the market.

Charrington United Breweries is borrowing £8 million in 8 per cent debentures 1987-92 at a price of £99½ per cent through a placing by Hill Samuel and Lazard Brothers. Arrangements are also in hand for a full 8 per cent loan from George Cohen 600 Group, Daniel Doncaster, and Chubb & Son.

Actual yields are likely to be around 8½ per cent, which is undoubtedly the highest high-class debenture borrowing since the war. It is further evidence of how far the economy has to go before conditions can begin to approach normal. For 8½ per cent for periods from twenty-five to thirty years is highly expensive money for industry to borrow, no matter what the development it is financing.

Registration

SIR, — Mr Barlow refers in his letter (July 23rd issue) to the discussions being held by the Institute and other bodies to consider the ways in which the profession may best be developed in the public interest, discussions which will have special regard to the scope for reducing the number of separate bodies and qualifications, the need for changes in methods and standards of education and training, the reflection of different educational levels in different grades of professional qualification, and the possibility of a single professional designation.

Few people inside or outside the profession would deny that the traditional methods of training leave much to be desired in an age of increasing sophistication in accounting techniques; the profession as a whole still labours under the burden of a nineteenth century concept of training only little removed from medieval notions of apprenticeship, and recent attempts to graft on to the main structure additional postgraduate qualifications more attuned to present-day needs can be regarded at best as only partial and temporary expedients.

The time may, in fact, have come for us to ask ourselves whether the accountancy profession is not really one, but two, and whether we should not be thinking in terms of division rather than unification. The accountant in public practice probably has more in common with the solicitor than with the accountant in industry, whose education and training call for a fundamentally different approach, and whose professional activities are governed more by the demands of management than by those of the Registrar of Companies or the Inspector of Taxes.

There may even be said to be a third field of accountancy which falls somewhere between the other two — that of the consultant, who shares the objective impartiality of the public accountant without his responsibility for the certification of statements for third parties, but who also shares the management attitude of the accountant in industry without his degree of committed involvement; from the point of view of training and experience, however, he is to all intents and purposes a commercial accountant.

It seems unlikely, therefore, that the public interest would best be served by the imposition of a uniformity of training and designation, but rather by the two sides of the profession more clearly identifying and distinguishing themselves. The existence of an 'umbrella' council such as that to which Mr Barlow refers, which commended itself so strongly to the subcommittee of the South West Essex Group of Chartered Accountants, and which, so far as may be judged from personal discussions with members of various accountancy bodies, commands a great deal of support throughout the profession, would allow this development to take place and at the same time achieve the aims expressed in the circular issued on March 30th.

It is to be hoped that the participating bodies will recognize in the course of their discussions that the public interest is primarily in those who offer their services to the public, and not in those who place them at the disposal of an individual employer who cares less about designations than he does about technical competence based on appropriate training and adequate experience.

Yours faithfully,

R. H. S. BEACHAM,

D.C.F. and Depreciation

SIR, — Discounted cash flow techniques are now being hailed as the new panacea for capital investment appraisal. There is certainly a strong case for treating future gross incomes as the repayment of a debt plus interest, nevertheless, advocates of D.C.F. invariably make unrealistic assumptions such as nil scrap value and equal working lives for capital assets compared.

The article in your issue of July 9th by D. C. Beaton unfortunately conforms to this practice. In addition, he omits all reference to the gross income arising from the capital investment and instead of discounting gross income, he discounts what he is pleased to call 'serviceability'. Gross income and serviceability are not even proportionately equal to each other over the life of the capital asset.

The correct formula for capital investment appraisal by D.C.F. is:

$$\begin{aligned} & \frac{\text{Discounted future gross incomes}}{\text{Initial cost} \times \text{Life unexpired}} \\ & \text{minus} \frac{\text{Initial cost} - \text{Realizable value}}{\text{Initial cost} \times \text{Life expired}} \end{aligned}$$

The annual depreciation charge is the gross income of the year less the annual allocation of the capital reserve arising from the excess of the initial discounted future gross incomes over the initial cost. This, in fact, results in a conventional depreciation charge.

Yours faithfully,

London W1.

No Investment Grant for Computer Lessees

SIR, — We are the users of a computer which is leased from one of the major computer manufacturers. We believe that most of the computers in use within industry are leased in this way, and so were interested to discover what benefit we should receive, if any, as a result of the scheme for extending investment grants to computers as it was published in January.

We were surprised to be told by the manufacturers that, in fact, no benefit would be passed on to the user. Presumably, therefore, the manufacturers as lessors will receive the benefit not only from the investment grants on computers leased, but also on their plant used in the production of these computers. We inquired from the Ministry of Technology whether this was the intention of the White Paper. Our inquiry was passed to the Board of Trade, who told us quite recently that the decision taken by the company in question could not be challenged, and that they believed this would be the attitude of all computer manufacturers.

Presumably, if we were to buy a computer outright we should be able to claim the grant and it seems to us that this creates an anomaly which is rather absurd. It would be interesting to know whether any of your readers have also encountered this problem, and whether they have been any more successful in handling it than we have.

Yours faithfully,

Company Law: Reform

Mr PATRICK JENKIN asked the President of the Board of Trade what consultations he intends to hold with representatives of industry, the professions and financial institutions on his proposals for reforming company law.

The Minister of State, Board of Trade (Mr GEORGE DARLING): The proposals will be drawn up in the light of the Report of the Jenkins Committee which took evidence from representative associations. I am ready to undertake further consultations with such associations where appropriate, but I cannot yet indicate what these consultations will be.

Mr JENKIN: Will the Minister of State recognize that there has been a considerable change in the view on many matters on which Jenkins reported since the date of that Report; and that it would be highly desirable before further company legislation was introduced that the most widespread consultation should take place?

Mr DARLING: Yes, sir. It is perfectly true, and, of course, since the Bill was published representations have been made to us which we are taking into consideration.

Bills of Sale and Moneylenders Acts: Amendment

Dr BENNETT asked the President of the Board of Trade when he will seek to amend the Bills of Sale and Moneylenders Acts.

Mr JAY: I hope to propose as soon as the legislative programme permits an amendment to the Moneylenders Acts relating to the exemption of companies bona fide carrying on the business of banking. I have no present intention of proposing amendments to the Bills of Sale Acts.

Decimal Currency System

Mr J. H. OSBORN asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had since May 17th, 1966, from trade, commercial and industrial associations, and organizations connected with consumer protection about the decision to bring in a £ cent system of decimal currency; and if he will publish a White Paper outlining the various systems of decimal currency which he has considered, the merits and demerits of each and the reason for the decision to adopt the £ cent system.

Mr CALLAGHAN: I have received seventeen representations. A White Paper will be published in due course which will, among other things, set out the reasons why the Government decided to retain a £ major unit. The merits and demerits of other decimal systems are considered in the Halsbury Report.

Mr OSBORN: Would not the right hon. gentleman agree that by 1971 the nation will have made an irrevocable decision based on the decision of March 1st? Is it not reasonable that those affected, including the National Chamber of Trade and other organizations among the seventeen, should make their arguments? Would the right hon. gentleman not consider these representations?

Mr CALLAGHAN: I have already said on previous occasions that this is, of course, an irrevocable step. My information is that industry broadly welcomes the fact that a decision has been taken and that we are to move into decimalization. The Government have adopted the majority view of the Halsbury Committee which investigated this at very great length for a very long time.

Mr CANT: Is it not true that the overwhelming body of information from industry and commerce is in support of the 10s unit? As my right hon. friend has said previously that he is legislating for 1,000 years, can his decision be pragmatic and not prestigious?

Mr CALLAGHAN: As I have explained previously, the Halsbury Committee

Income Tax: Fraudulent Claims

Mr J. H. OSBORN asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many prosecutions he has made against private and public companies and other corporate bodies for fraudulent claims against income tax in connection with investment, initial and annual allowances for buildings and plant and machinery; what were the sums involved; how many prosecutions were successful; and what fines were imposed in total for each of the last five years.

Mr MACDERMOT: None, Sir.

Married Women: Income Tax

Mr ONSLOW asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the overall economic effect of introducing separate income tax assessment for the earnings of married women, taking into account the incentive which this would provide to more married women to take up full- or part-time employment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr JAMES CALLAGHAN): The special income tax reliefs for a wife's earnings already have the effect that over practically the whole field the income tax due on her earnings is the same as that for a single person. I am circulating some examples in the Official Report which show that in the normal case the tax due from a married couple who are both earning is not only less than it would be if the husband earned all the income himself, but also less than it would be if husband and wife were two single persons.

The examples are as follows:

Earnings (per year and per week)			Tax paid per annum			Tax paid per annum if all the income earned by husband			Tax paid per annum if they were two single persons
Husband	Wife		Husband	Wife	Total	On husband's income	On wife's income	Total
£	s	d	£	s	d	£	s	d	£	s	d
£520 (£10 a week)	£260 (£5 a week)		12	17	9	12	17	9	45	6	8
£780 (£15 a week)	£520 (£10 a week)		70	0	0	45	6	8	115	15	0
£2,080 (£40 a week)	£1,040 (£20 a week)		483	6	8	348	16	8	115	15	0

Metrostore (Trading) Limited

Mr SHARPLES asked the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made by his inspector investigating the affairs of Metrostore (Trading) Ltd.

Mr DARLING: The inspector has made progress, but he cannot yet indicate when he expects to make his report to the Board of Trade. He has been delayed by his inability to get certain information.

Hansard, July 14th, 1966. Oral answers, col. 1697.

Motor Insurance: Committee of Inquiry

Mr OAKES asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he will set up a committee of inquiry into motor insurance.

Mr JAY: No. But I hope in due course to introduce legislation amending the Insurance Companies Act 1958.

Hansard, July 14th, 1966. Written answers, col. 236.

3½ per cent War Loan

Mr POUNDER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the comparable value in present day terms at July 1st, 1966, of 3½ per cent War Stock which was 103  $\frac{1}{8}$  on January 1st, 1946, taking into account the fall in the value of the £ sterling in the intervening twenty years.

Mr MACDERMOT: On July 1st, the price of 3½ per cent War Loan was 50½. Taking account of changes in the purchasing power of the £ sterling between the year 1946 and May 1966, this is equivalent to about 24½ in 1946.

Hansard, July 14th, 1966. Written answers, col. 273.

Investment Grants

Mr HALL-DAVIS asked the President of the Board of Trade what steps he proposes to take further to publicize the new system of investment grants.

Mr JAY: A booklet explaining the scheme in more detail will be published as soon as possible after the Bill has become law and this will be given wide publicity. I intend also to announce in the autumn full details of the administration of the scheme. Application forms will be accompanied by guidance notes indicating how the forms are to be completed.

Hansard, July 14th, 1966. Oral answers, col. 1700.

Banking Profits

Mr WILLIAM HAMILTON asked the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has for ensuring that banking profits are fully disclosed.

Mr JAY: I expect to propose, as I did in the Companies Bill introduced in the last Parliament, that the Board of Trade should have power by order to modify or repeal the provision in the Companies Act 1948, which controls disclosure by banking companies.

Mr HAMILTON: Can my right hon. friend say whether he intends to introduce that Bill in the current session? Secondly, does he accept, in whole or in part, the validity of the banks' argument as to why they should not make full disclosure?

Mr JAY: The answer to the second question is 'Not fully'. The answer to the first is that I hope to legislate during the present session.

AUDIT STAFF

This week we are aiming solely at audit staff as the bulk of the vacancies registered with us during the last two weeks have been on this side.

We feel that there are many audit assistants in the London area who do not realize that the market is so good, as one can easily get out of touch with such matters.

Vacancies are coming in all the time for all grades of audit clerks - BOTH QUALIFIED AND UNQUALIFIED (unqualified men have no need to worry at all about changing) at salary levels from £850 p.a. for semi-seniors - to £2,500 p.a. for audit managers. Recently qualified C.A.s are always in great demand by all sizes of firms.

Opportunities, nowadays, are better than they have ever been. With the ever-increasing drain into commerce and industry, the profession is able to offer much better prospects to those who wish to remain in the profession than they were able to four or five years ago.

We should like to (and can) prove this. You are therefore invited to call in to our offices to discuss your personal career with Graham Elmslie, our professional staff consultant. This will put you under NO OBLIGATION whatsoever - but at the same time we feel it will be a profitable call!

What is a Trade?

THE Income Tax Acts abound with references to 'trade' which they define as including 'every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade' - a definition which leaves much to be desired. Cynics might say that as far as the Inland Revenue are concerned, if a transaction makes a profit it is a trade and the profit is taxable; if it makes a loss, it is not a trade and therefore the loss does not qualify for relief.

The efforts of the Inland Revenue to protect the revenue in this way have given rise to numerous appeals which in turn have given rise to nice distinctions, if not downright anomalies.

Broadly speaking, the question whether or not a given transaction or set of transactions constitute a trade, in the income tax sense, is a question of fact. Questions of fact are decided by the Appeal Commissioners and their decision is final unless the dissatisfied party can persuade the High Court, or higher Courts, that there was no evidence on which the Appeal Commissioners could reach their conclusion, or that their conclusion is unreasonable in the light of the evidence.

High Court judges are not infallible and different ones take different views of what is reasonable. In the end the income tax adviser finds himself in a position where he cannot advise firmly one way or another and the whole question becomes a gamble. One of the unknowns is the attitude which the INSPECTOR OF TAXES will take up, and perhaps this is more important in practice than the eventual attitude of the High Court judge if the case goes so far.

In the early years of this century, the Inland Revenue usually tried to establish that there was a trade while the taxpayer tried to refute it. This was because taxpayers in general were more innocent than they are now; they did not spend much time studying the provisions for relief in respect of losses but were more inclined to study ways of making profit.

There were, of course, exceptions. Even in 1898 there was an unsuccessful attempt to obtain loss relief by a commercial traveller who had lost a lot of money trying to develop and sell a patent. It is refreshing to read of his counsel arguing that 'It is not necessary for a man to sell anything in order to become a trader. Directly he has purchased goods and put them in his window, he is a trader at once. If I buy a thing with the intention of selling it, that constitutes me a trader.' The Inland Revenue thought otherwise, or said they did (Grimes v. Lethem (3 T.C. 622)).

Now that taxation has become so crushing and so absurd, it is not surprising that many able people spend less time actually trying to earn profits, and more time trying to turn the tortuous provisions of the Acts to good account. The extensive dividend stripping of recent years depended largely on the reliefs available in respect of losses 'in trade' which could be set against tax deducted (or deemed to be deducted) from taxed income. The very success of the Inland Revenue in previous years in establishing that specific transactions constituted trading has tended to turn sour on them. This has given rise to the numerous anti-dividend-stripping provisions which have been enacted in the period beginning with 1955.

However, the Revenue have not merely relied on these provisions, even when they were available, but have attacked on the broader front and, in general, with considerable success. Their victory in Johnson v. Jewitt (40 A.T.C. 109, 314), was perhaps a triumph of common sense over extreme optimism. The appellant formed a partnership with two associates which claimed to be dealing in shares. It manufactured a chain of companies each of which received a gift of £50,000 which it promptly lent back to the partnership for the purpose of the next gift. The aggregate reserves of all these companies was in the millions, although never more than £63,000 of actual cash was involved. The companies purported to pay dividends out of these reserves, and the partnership then sold the issued capitals at a loss and claimed set off. The appellant asked, if this was not trading, what was it? DONOVAN, L.J., said it was a cheap exercise in fiscal conjuring and book-keeping fantasy.

That was in November 1961. Six months earlier DONOVAN, L.J., had strongly dissented from a decision of the Court of Appeal that a merchanting company which changed its objects to investment dealing, bought up the capital of another company, stripped it of dividend, and then sold the stripped shares at a loss, was trading (Griffiths v. J. P. Harrison (Watford) Ltd (40 A.T.C. 132)). However, in March 1962, that decision was upheld in the House of Lords, although Lord REID and Lord DENNING joined DONOVAN, L.J., as dissenters (41 A.T.C. 36). All three took the view that the Special Commissioners were entitled on the facts to find that there was no trading.

The Harrison decision was a great encouragement to dividend strippers but that it has its limits is clear from a decision of the House of Lords last week where they rejected a submission that the Harrison decision covered the case then before them (Bishop v. Finsbury Securities Ltd). This case arose from transactions carried out in 1958, 1959 and 1960 which are known as 'forward stripping'. The facts of the case form a useful background to section 28 of the Finance Act 1960, part of which was no doubt enacted in consequence of those transactions.

The appellant was admittedly a dealer in shares. The question was whether the acquisition and disposal of shares in the course of the forward stripping constituted trading transactions of that trade. One can sympathize with the Special Commissioners. In the Harrison case they had held that ordinary stripping was not trading, but the House of Lords held in effect that they were unreasonable in coming to that conclusion. In the Finsbury case they held that there was no fundamental difference between ordinary stripping and forward stripping, so that was trading, too. Once again the House of Lords has held that they were unreasonable. Sympathy with the Special Commissioners must extend to the taxpayer himself and his advisers.

However, close examination of the extremely complicated transactions in the Finsbury case indicates why the House of Lords did not follow its Harrison decision. Artificiality could scarcely go further, although it was not suggested that the documents used were shams. The managing director of the appellant company was a chartered accountant who worked out schemes for enabling the shareholders of other companies to extract profits in a non-taxable form.

One method was as follows. The company to be stripped ('CS') created one hundred 'preferred' shares carrying the right to all the distributable profits for the next five years. These profits, by a nice touch, were defined in the resolution by reference to paragraphs 4 and 5 of Schedule 3 to the Finance (No. 2) Act 1955 which are themselves part of elaborate anti-dividend-stripping provisions of the Income Tax Acts. The total profits so applicable were not to exceed £60,000 net.

On the day of their creation these peculiar shares were allotted by way of £100 bonus and the allottees sold them to the appellant company ('FS') for £60,100 of which only £20,100 was to be paid forthwith. The £60,100 was not a fixed price; under the sale agreement it was to be reduced by the amount by which the aggregate dividends fell short of the £60,000. On the other hand, the purchase price was to be increased by one-half of the tax which FS recovered by way of loss relief on its purchase and sale of these remarkable shares.

The manner of payment of the initial £20,100 had its own peculiar features. FS borrowed it from a bank which stipulated that the vendors should at once allow the bank to hold the money by way of charge pending the reduction of the FS overdraft. There were some twelve transactions of this kind by FS, and their resemblance to the transactions contemplated by section 28 (2) (c) of the Finance Act 1960 is quite striking. But, of course, they were not caught by that section because they were carried out before the section was passed.

An example of another method adopted by FS is as follows. A company ('M') was trading as an estate developer, building houses on land of which it had acquired a ninety-nine-year lease. The development would produce a profit. Its shareholders sold its issued capital to FS for £100 plus 85 per cent of M's profit (computed as before on an arbitrary basis) for the next accounting year. The vendors covenanted with FS that if any of M's assets remained unsold at the end of the period, they would themselves see that M sold them at a price equal to cost, or the value if higher. On the same day the same parties entered into a 'supplemental' agreement ensuring that M should make a distribution by way of dividend of all its profit for the period in question. In the same 'supplemental' agreement FS covenanted to claim relief from the Inland Revenue in respect of the loss sustained by FS on the purchase and disposal of M shares.

It will be recalled that the Harrison decision in the House of Lords, that ordinary stripping was trading, was a bare majority decision. On the facts in FS, the House has decided unanimously that these transactions were not trading transactions and, inferentially, that the Special Commissioners were unreasonable in applying the Harrison decision to them.

Lord Morris said that the transactions were not sham transactions; they were as real as they were elaborate. But they were no more than devices to effect the avowed purpose of tax avoidance. They contemplated the denial to the Revenue of certain sums which would then find their way into the pockets of the shareholders of the stripped companies, less such proportion as was the payment to FS for the skilful services rendered.

His lordship said he would be sorry if any reasoning or any authority required him to denigrate share dealing by associating these arrangements with those ordinarily classed as share dealing. They were essentially different from the arrangements in the Harrison case. There, shares were bought, a dividend was received, the shares were sold. The fact that welcome fiscal benefit would follow did not alter the essential nature of the transaction as share dealing. Once the vendors had sold they had no further interest. But in the FS case the vendors were being safeguarded; they continued to receive in effect what they would have received as shareholders, but in addition they were to receive extra tax benefits. FS had to retain the shares for this purpose, and was not 'dealing' in them.

Top Management Reading

WHAT publications are read by Britain's 'top' business men? To find out the answer to this question, The Economist last year commissioned a readership survey from Marplan Ltd. The results of this survey now disclose some interesting, and for The Accountant highly gratifying, information.

The survey was conducted among A/B class business men, defined as employers, managers, professional and technical personnel engaged in industry, commerce and the public service. Of this classification totalling some 800,000, the top 54% – about 430,000 – are A class business men who, states the survey, in view of their capacity for decision, corporate purchasing influence and personal spending power, are the subject of a separate analysis.<sup>1</sup>

Besides a number of daily, Sunday and monthly newspapers and periodicals, the survey covered fifteen weekly publications, including The Accountant. With an estimated current readership of 60,000, or 14%, among A class business men, The Accountant enjoys pride of place of the four 'special interest' publications (which include also Stock Exchange Gazette, Investors Chronicle and Taxation), and ranks third in the fifteen, being headed only by Punch and The Economist.

The Accountant heads the list of weeklies for what is termed 'frequency of reading', i.e. the ratio of regular to occasional readership, with 53%. Taxation follows with 49%; then New Society (42%), New Scientist (41%), The Economist (38%), etc.

In the A/B survey (limited private circulation only), The Accountant also heads the list of weeklies as a 'source of critical opinion', 27% of readers regarding it as 'essential' reading; next is The Economist (17%), followed by Investors Chronicle (14%) and Stock Exchange Gazette (12%). As an essential 'source of factual information', The Accountant is rated well in advance of the other weeklies, with 55% of readers so describing it; the next nearest are Investors Chronicle and Stock Exchange Gazette, each with 19%.

Another tabulation in the A class survey is important both as a further indication of the value of a publication to readers in their business activities, and – as the survey points out – 'to advertisers interested in the corporate purchasing influence of the business reader'. This is the 'place of reading' table which shows The Accountant in the lead with 67% of office readers; then follows Investors Chronicle (58%); The Economist (55%); Stock Exchange Gazette (51%).

These findings must be related to the obvious fact – as satisfying to members of the accountancy profession as to ourselves – that qualified accountants comprise a significant proportion of this economically important section of the business community. We may be forgiven, perhaps, for noting with no less satisfaction the A class survey's finding, as a measure of cost-effectiveness, that our advertising rates – adjusted to a standardized measure of 100 square inches R.O.P. (run of paper) per 1,000 readers – are not only the lowest among the four 'special interest' weeklies, but considerably lower than those of any of the other weeklies and, with one exception, lower than any other British publication in the survey.

The 'Voluntary' Standstill

IN whatever terms the Minister responsible may describe the powers to be conferred upon him by the prices and incomes standstill, the fact remains that they represent an unprecedented degree of Government economic intervention in time of peace. It is a misuse of language to talk of 'voluntary' restraint when substantial penalties for infringements are to be enacted. In any case, without overall compulsion the proposals are unworkable in the longer term, not least since they simply do not make economic sense except in an economy completely organized and regulated by the State.

Last week's White Paper proposes that a standstill on virtually all prices and incomes shall take effect from July 20th and last until the end of this year. In the following half-year to the end of June 1967 there will be a further period of 'severe restraint'. The only case where a price increase is to be permitted is where a marked increase in costs cannot be absorbed; for example, because of higher import prices or increased indirect taxation. Where a manufacturer feels he cannot absorb the increased costs over which he has no control, e.g. in respect of bought-in components, then any increase he makes will be subject to the 'most rigorous scrutiny'.

The 'early warning' arrangements currently in force are to be extended over a wider area of industry and the Government says it intends to consult with the Confederation of British Industry and other bodies on this matter. Rents are to be fixed for the period of the standstill in respect of privately-rented accommodation, local authority houses, and business premises.

No increases in incomes or reductions of working hours are to be granted except where the higher pay arises from increased productivity or from genuine promotion, and not mere re-grading of employees to circumvent the standstill. It is in this area, as is becoming increasingly apparent, that the Government will encounter severe opposition from the unions, more especially from members who may be unwilling to accept their leaders' advice. Certainly their views on the standstill, in so far as it applies even to those awards already agreed and due to come into effect soon after July 20th, will not be mollified by some other aspects of the White Paper. Likewise, the three million workers whose pay is linked with the cost of living will find that this arrangement is also deferred. In short, for the standstill period the 'incomes norm must be regarded as zero'.

Nevertheless it seems that normal incremental increases arising either from age, e.g. youth to man, or those specified on a predetermined salary scale, e.g. local authority employees and teachers, will be granted. This latter provision will surely not pass unnoticed by the union leaders.

While it is not expected that 'there will be any general increase in dividends' (and the prospective deflation and increased taxation has ensured this state of affairs), the White Paper states categorically that 'all dividends are subject to the standstill'. The only exception applies to closely-controlled companies where the Revenue will benefit from the required distributions!

The primary and avowed object of this legislation, it is stated, is to provide a 'breathing space of twelve months in which productivity can catch up with the excessive increases in incomes which have been taking place'. But what are the grounds for this belief? During the past year, with a buoyant economy, productivity rose by barely 2 per cent. The next twelve months will see the severest credit squeeze yet, a down-turn in industrial investment, increased costs for many industries as they carry redundant staff, and dwindling profit margins. In such conditions the increase in productivity is likely to be zero, too, but whereas in due course incomes, together with prices, will spiral upwards to make up the delay, this will not happen to production.

On the debit side, however, the consequences of the present measures are more serious. They do nothing to attack the root causes of low productivity or inefficiency; indeed, they create conditions in which industry would find it practicable merely to drift, pending some change either in policy or administration. If the Government believes that the only method of reorganizing the United Kingdom economy is by decree, then it should abandon any talk of incentives and private enterprise. The perils of the present drift are clear.

The Future for Steel

THE recent Commons debate on the steel nationalization Bill threw little light on the future development of this key industry. In contrast, the first report of the Development Co-ordinating Committee of the British Iron and Steel Federation is a mine of information. Headed by Sir HENRY BENSON, C.B.E., F.C.A., as independent chairman, the committee comprised in addition to the chairmen of three major steel companies, Sir DUNCAN OPPENHEIM, President of British American Tobacco, and Sir PETER RUNGE, currently Vice-President of the Confederation of British Industry.

The committee has more than achieved its object which was to effect a comprehensive review of the iron and steel industry. The first report examines the factors likely to determine the structure of the industry by the mid-1970s on the twin assumptions that Britain does not devalue, but does join the European Economic Community. The second report now in preparation will examine, in consultation with the companies concerned, the steps to be taken to adapt the present structure of the industry to the future.

Two considerations underlie the committee's thinking: the need to organize the industry into steel-making works which provide 'minimum total costs per ton of output', and the need to ensure that the new works should 'remain open to competitive pressures in order to ensure continuing efficiency in the longer run'. As the committee drily comments, 'efficiency is not something which, once achieved by means of a major structural rationalization, remains for ever thereafter'.

The basis of the future structure of the industry is, of course, the demand for steel and this the committee estimates at some thirty-five million tons, compared with the present output of nearly twenty-six million tons. The next stage is to visualize the type of works needed to produce this output. It is clear from the report that most of the existing steel works are too small, hence the committee recommends the creation of new units which will be considerably larger. For example, the proposed wide-strip mills should produce between four and five million tons per annum, while the proposed multi-product works should have an average capacity of at least three million tons.

Quite apart from the enlargement of the production units, the committee visualizes a considerable measure of re-siting of the industry. This arises from the fact that the main raw material of the future will be scrap and ore which can most easily be imported. The committee visualizes that new plants will have to be based near deep-water ports capable of taking ore ships of at least 65,000 tons. Apart from the re-siting of the main production by the mid-1970s, which will entail some deployment of the labour force, the committee anticipates that the projected output should be produced with a labour force of around 215,000 in place of the present force of some 317,000 men.

Since 1956 the industry has spent some £1,070 million in new production facilities; the present capital stock has an estimated replacement value of some £2,400 million. Nevertheless, for the fourteen major companies profits before depreciation, tax and interest, have declined sharply since the mid-1950s and, between 1960-64, have averaged only 7.4 per cent on the capital employed.

In 1964-65, a year of record output, it is noteworthy that the average rate of return was only 6.1 per cent. There were three main reasons for these results. First, the control of prices exercised by the Iron and Steel Board; secondly, the world steel surplus which cut export profits sharply; and thirdly, the decline in capacity utilization from an average of 91 per cent during 1956-60 to only 82 per cent between 1961-65.

Despite these highly unsatisfactory returns on capital, the industry does not anticipate any difficulty in financing its proposed development. In recent years the industry has leaned heavily upon internal finance and it expects to continue to be able to do so in the future. Its ability to do this clearly depends upon a higher rate of profitability which in turn depends on selling prices and not least upon labour and fuel costs.

Fuel costs, for example, account for 22 per cent of production costs, and the committee has much to say on the question of whether the past advantage enjoyed in cheap fuel is not now diminishing. It also comments that 'the unions could usefully increase the flexibility of rolling-mill capacity and so minimize costs by removing the barriers which inhibit the switching of workpeople between the various parts of the works as market requirements fluctuate'. It is not difficult to see on what factors the future of the industry depends!

Current Affairs

Municipal Treasurers' Examinations

THERE were 1,955 candidates for the May examinations of The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, of whom 669 (34 per cent) passed.

In Part A of the Final, 639 candidates sat and 180 (28 per cent) were successful (this compares with 31 per cent in 1965 and 33 per cent in 1964). In Part B of the Final there were 356 candidates, of whom 171 (48 per cent) passed (39 per cent in 1965 and 45 per cent in 1964).

A total of 960 candidates sat for the Intermediate examination and 318 (33 per cent) passed (33 per cent in 1965 and 31 per cent in 1964).

Places and prizes will be awarded on the combined results of these examinations and those to be held in November. The names of the successful candidates in the two parts of the Final, together with a summary of the results, appear elsewhere in this issue.

Occupational Pension Schemes

AN official survey by the Government Actuary's Department reveals that there are about sixty thousand pension schemes in Britain, which today probably cover about twelve million people. The results of the survey, in which 2,000 firms were invited to take part early in 1964, appear in a report by the Government Actuary published on Friday of last week (H.M.S.O., price 5s 6d).

The sixty thousand schemes were operated on behalf of organizations employing some twenty million people, or about 80 per cent of the country's total labour force. Many of these people, however, did not qualify for admission to the schemes because they were too young or their length of service was too short. Nearly two million persons were receiving pensions from the schemes and contribution income from employers and members amounted to nearly £1,000 million per annum. Expenditure on benefits totalled about £600 million per annum.

The report shows that there is a great diversity of schemes owing to varying combinations of conditions as to contributions, benefits and administration. For example, nearly one-third of members do not contribute to their schemes, but among those that do so the contribution expressed as a percentage of pay, ranges from 1 to 6 per cent. Pensions usually begin at age 65 for men and 60 for women and may represent either a fixed annual sum for each year of service or be expressed in relation to average or final salary. There may also be lump-sum retirement benefits, often obtained by commuting part of the pension.

Three million active members are covered for widows' pension, and the remainder are mostly eligible for lump-sum death benefits. About one employer in three augments pensions to compensate for increases in the cost of living.

The methods used and amounts involved are discussed in considerable detail in the report, with copious illustrations. A section deals with the preservation of pension when a member leaves the service of the firm; the rules of four schemes in five now include some provision for preservation, but this is usually optional, the alternative being a refund of contributions. Details are given of the limited extent to which the options to preserve are exercised in practice by employers and members.

Print Design 1967

'PRINT design 1967', a major exhibition of British business printing, is to be held at the Design Centre, London, early next year and is being arranged by the British Federation of Master Printers and the Council of Industrial Design. Entries, which may be made by print users, designers, or any others involved in the production of printed matter, can include catalogues, leaflets, booklets, stationery, company reports and accounts, house magazines, calendars, menus and invitations, share certificates, and business forms of all kinds. Submissions, which must be received not later than September 30th, should be sent to the British Federation of Master Printers, 11 Bedford Row, London WC1, from whom entry forms and prospectuses are available.

The final selection of material to be shown in the exhibition will be made by an eminent panel of designers and printers, under the chairmanship of A. E. Everett Jones, who will represent the 'users' point of view.

E.C.G.D. Business

IN the second quarter of 1966, the Export Credits Guarantee Department insured 'commercial' business amounting to £344.4 million. This figure represents a 12 per cent increase over the same period of last year, but, perhaps largely due to the seamen's strike, is 12 per cent down on the first quarter of 1966. The current maximum liability at the end of the quarter was £1,280.5 million as against £1,092.9 million a year ago.

New 'commercial' business insured during the quarter on terms exceeding six months' credit included contracts for telecommunications (£9.8 million), aircraft (£5 million) and a scheme for docks expansion (£4.2 million).

The number of comprehensive policies current (under section 1 of the Export Guarantees Acts) at the end of the second quarter of 1966 was 8,819. This compared with 8,589 at the beginning of the quarter and 7,874 at the end of the corresponding quarter last year.

The face value of comprehensive policies current at the end of the quarter was £1,772.7 million, compared with £1,691.9 million at the beginning of the quarter, and £1,473.4 million at the end of the corresponding quarter last year.

New specific policies (covering individual contracts) to a face value of £19.8 million were issued during the quarter. Taking these together with new contracts involving more than six months' credit declared under comprehensive policies, the total of new business insured during the quarter where terms have exceeded six months' credit was £50.6 million, compared with the quarterly average over the previous twelve months of £57 million.

The combined value of all comprehensive and specific insured business (including external trade) declared as shipped during the quarter amounted to £339.8 million, compared with £383.8 million in the previous quarter and £295.5 million in the corresponding quarter last year.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

LEAVING a lecture on the capital gains tax the other evening, our heads rather befogged, some of us settled down to talk over cups of coffee about the headaches of our working lives. Every accountant knows them well . . . unco-operative colleagues, unappreciative bosses, the bright ideas that we have failed to sell, the mistakes and misjudgements that blot our copy books . . . how much easier, we agreed gloomily, to spend one's time in an academic ivory tower, explaining the enormities of the Finance Acts.

Robert, for example, listed the highlights of his own personal nightmares. As chief accountant of a small though fast-growing chain of retail grocery stores he was responsible for finance, costing, tax, insurance, and internal systems, as well as the overall burden of the accounts staff involved. True, they were a good hard-working bunch – mostly with long service – and were thoroughly reliable, but there was little potential among them for advancement. Company policy had been to recruit young unqualified men; the obvious absence of senior promotional outlets had ensured that the brightest stars soon left for other posts.

He was well paid for his work, Robert admitted, though the load was heavy, but there was more to it than that. He had hierarchical worries. His directors were members of an old family group which traditionally regarded their staff as second-class citizens. Words like 'workpeople' and 'counterhands' were used freely. Robert himself was always conscious of an intangible barrier between himself and the aloof alien faces across the boardroom table. They continually sought reports from him on every conceivable phase of the company's activities, and he was nigh exhausted trying to meet their requirements.

There was no satisfying them. They listened carefully to his submissions; they questioned him minutely. They expressed no opinions themselves and showed little emotional reaction. Unsure of their overall policy and not always briefed as to their real objectives, Robert was bogged down hopelessly in masses of figures prepared to meet contingencies.

'I wouldn't mind if they were frank with me', he mourned, 'but after listening to me they withdraw to make their decisions in private. The managing director conveys a ruling to me and chokes me off if I try to re-open the subject. He just says that they've talked it out and the matter is closed. Robert is essentially a cheerful gregarious character and their icy detachment is getting him down. 'Dammit', he exploded, 'they barely recognize me if we meet in the street outside. My dismissal might be in the morning post.'

Help was obviously needed, since the trouble appeared to stem primarily from incompatibility. Strengthening of his subordinates was the first essential either by recruitment or internal training. If his staff could be built up to present dynamic reports to the board, under Robert's guidance of course, his own burden would be lessened and his perspective enlightened. He'd behaved like the typical middle-level autocrat of the thirties unaware of the merits of group strengths, not perceiving that the better the team, the better the manager. Make your assistants into enthusiastic specialists and draw freely on their skills, we told him; don't try to be a Jack-of-all-trades yourself.

As regards decisions, he'd obviously gone the wrong way with his pages of statistics. Instead he should make firm recommendations supported by brief appendices of confirmatory data and help to shape his board's thinking. Maybe their detachment masked ignorance or confusion; the accountant's duty was to give a lead. Lick 'em or leave 'em, we chorused.

But it's so easy to solve your neighbour's problems; one's own headaches are not so easily disposed of.

Direct Costing is a Useful Management Tool

A Case History

by R. S. FRASER, B.Com., A.C.A., F.C.W.A., J.Dip.M.A.

IN his article 'Is Direct Costing a Useful Tool for Management?' in The Accountant of June 18th, Professor Sorgdrager includes the following among the purposes of direct costing:

- (a) it leads to easier administrative control;
- (b) it can be used in profit planning;
- (c) it increases internal production efficiency; and
- (d) it helps the formation of a management policy.

If direct costing can really do all this, there seems to be no doubt of its usefulness as a tool for management, and it is difficult to understand why 'a warning must be sounded immediately that supporters of direct costing tend to overvalue this method'.

Amongst the warnings sounded about the care which is necessary when using direct or marginal costing is the difficulty of precise definition of costs. Academically there is a conflict in so far as in marginal costing only variable costs are charged to products, whilst fixed costs are written off against profits in the period in which they arise, whereas in direct costing all direct costs are charged to products, and this may include some fixed costs (I.C.W.A. Terminology).

A similar problem of definition arises when economists and accountants discuss marginal costing, because the economist's definition is 'the amount of the change in aggregate costs caused by producing one more article or one less'; this worries the accountant because when one hundred more or one hundred less are produced, it is not necessarily correct to multiply the marginal cost by one hundred. A time comes, in fact, when some fixed costs have a tendency to vary and some variable costs have a tendency to become fixed.

In practice these difficulties of definition need not be a stumbling-block because a successful scheme must above all be workable and therefore fairly simple. The scheme described in this article and which has been in use for well over a year, would perhaps not qualify as 'pure' direct or marginal costing from a strictly academic point of view, but the fact that it works effectively and gives a great deal of useful management information seems a sufficient reason to justify its continued use.

The omission of sophistication was deliberate in order to get the scheme working; refinements, it was felt, could be introduced later, though, in fact, very few changes were found to be necessary. The first lesson, therefore, seems to be that short cuts which are necessary to make a system workable may slightly reduce the accuracy, but certainly not the usefulness, of the technique.

If, in fact, one ignores all items which are within 5 per cent of par, one probably eliminates all the theoretical shortcomings; the remaining items are, after all, the ones on which the most urgent managerial action is required.

Allocation of overheads

The second type of warning is the implication that if marginal costing is used, overheads are never allocated to products or processes, and therefore it is not possible to include them (for instance) in stock and work in progress. In the company whose system is described below, marginal costing is used and so is comprehensive budgetary control – completely integrated with the financial accounts. It is therefore clear that whenever allocation of overheads is necessary, this can readily be done. This applies to:

- (a) valuing stock and work in progress;
- (b) evaluating the merits of alternative methods of production;
- (c) comparing costs between different factories in a group;
- (d) estimating the viability of a new product or process;
- (e) assessing the long-term profitability of a venture (or a process or department).

It is the importance of the difference between long-term and short-term problems of management which is the main argument for the use of marginal costing. In the short-term, factories, plant, work-people, customers, and so on, exist in measurable quantities which cannot quickly be substantially changed. Management's job is to maximize the return from the use of these assets. I submit that Professor Sorgdrager's 'controversy about whether or not fixed costs should be included in computing the costs of the product', is largely irrelevant in the short-term.

No matter what the 'total cost' is calculated at, a product can be sold for the highest price the buyer is prepared to pay for it – and management's decision must be based, not on the answer to the question 'Does it cover all our costs?', but rather 'Is it an attractive proposition to accept at this time?'

The case history about to be described is based on acceptance of the following argument. There exists in the company one definite limiting factor (machine time) and the maximization of short-term profits depends on control of the profitability per unit of the limiting factor (machine hour). It also depends, partly in the short-term and certainly in the long-term, on the control (in the sense of getting value for money) of all overhead expenses. The first is measured by marginal costing, the second by budgetary control.

All the information necessary for the control of the return per machine-hour was already in existence, and the first task in installing the system was to rearrange it, first, to set standards, and secondly, to measure performance.

It was decided that the cost of direct materials, direct labour and packing and transport would be regarded as marginal costs; and that all other costs would be called 'overheads', whether variable or not, and would be paid for out of the contribution (net selling price less marginal cost).

Before accepting any order it was customary to prepare an estimate on which the quotation was based. Accordingly the estimate cards for all jobs actually produced in a four-week period were taken and re-written in the following form:

Estimated direct materials (including scrap allowance) .. ..	xx
„ direct labour (allowing for scrap) .. ..	xx
„ packing and transport .. ..	xx	xx
Contribution .. ..	xx per saleable gross

The contribution per gross was then converted to a contribution per hour (C.P.H.) by reference to the estimated number of saleable articles produced per hour. When all the cards were completed, they were sorted into groups relating to each type of machine on which the work was planned, and the C.P.H.s were tabulated. In every case a fairly normal distribution pattern emerged, which showed clearly what was a normal C.P.H. for each machine in current market conditions, and which jobs were most and which jobs least profitable.

The 'normal' C.P.H.s were thereafter regarded as standard or target C.P.H.s, and the data on the estimate cards regarded as standard marginal costs for each job.

The production plan

Potential 'saleable' time is always less than total available machine time because of development work, break-downs, change-overs, sample work; furthermore, some machines are to some extent specialized. The works manager was therefore asked to set out a typical number of operating hours per week for each type of machine. The profit which would result from this level of activity was calculated, on the assumption that standard C.P.H.s were achieved and that overheads were at (flexed) budget level. Similarly, the required levels of activity to achieve break-even, budget profit, and twice budget profit were calculated. These calculations provided the basis for the machine-loading aspect of production planning.

This approach brought about a quite remarkable change in management thinking; it now became clear that every hour which a machine stood idle when it could have been working lost a potential profit equal to its C.P.H. This change was reflected in many ways. For instance, overtime and shift-working became attractive in times of increased demand, because contribution less overtime premium looked much more attractive than 'net profit' less overtime premium. The attitude changed towards doing change-over and maintenance work outside normal hours as far as possible, because it obviously increased potential running hours in normal time. A proposal to replace six old machines by three larger new ones was modified so that the new machines came in and the best three of the old ones were also kept, thus increasing aggregate potential running time.

Estimating and selling price policy

The role of the estimating section was to calculate a target selling price. This was done by calculating marginal cost per gross, converting it to so much per machine-hour, adding the target C.P.H., and re-converting to so much per gross. A quotation was normally presented to the salesman as '70s per gross, being 40s marginal cost and 30s contribution'.

Some discretion was allowed in deciding whether or not to quote at this figure. For example, a higher price was quoted if it was thought likely that the market would bear more, or on work for machines whose capacity in the foreseeable future was over full.

In the past a salesman would visit a customer armed with a copy of the quotation and a 'total cost' estimate; in the event of price negotiations he would eliminate some portion of the overheads if he wanted the business sufficiently. In cases of doubt he would telephone his director to obtain a minimum acceptable price. A great deal of experience had been acquired over the years which influenced the decisions, but in the last resort the 'final offer' was somewhat arbitrary.

Under the new system it became possible to issue precise instructions. By reference to the order book (which was analysed into hours of work for each type of machine), the sections which were over- or under-employed stood out. The weekly instructions would be, for example:

- (a) on machines A, B, D, G and H – no price concession (i.e. order book is adequate);
- (b) on C and E you can, if necessary, concede up to 10 per cent of contribution (i.e. these machines are rather short of work);
- (c) on F you can, if necessary, concede up to 25 per cent (or even 40 per cent) of contribution (i.e. these machines are extremely short of work).

The fact that 10 per cent of contribution might be  $\frac{1}{2}d$  or 2s 6d a gross, on different jobs, made no difference; the sacrifice was identical.

Production

Actual data available included the quantity produced (before and after inspection) and the length of time the machine had been run. Each week all the output was evaluated in these terms:

$$\frac{\text{Standard contribution per gross} \times \text{output in gross}}{\text{Machine-hours used}}$$

All the jobs for which the evaluation was more than 5 per cent below the target C.P.H. were listed and discussed with the works manager, to obtain his reactions. His answers fell into two categories, those which began 'Well you see . . .', and those for which he strongly denied any responsibility.

The first category included machines which were not working satisfactorily, imperfect dies (e.g. a twelve-impression die of which only nine were usable), an unsuitable operator or one being trained, and use of an inappropriate machine because of imbalance in the work load. Decisions were taken quite quickly to replace some machines, to thoroughly overhaul others, and to repair or replace dies; some operators were redeployed and others replaced. The benefits were immediate and measurable.

The second category needed closer investigation. First, the actual rate of production was compared with the estimated rate. If the estimated rate was higher than the actual, then either the estimate was too high or the actual rate was too low. By bringing the works manager and the estimator together it was usually possible to determine the responsibility, and corrective action was often indicated.

If, however, the C.P.H. – both on actual performance and on the estimate – was below target, the implication could only be that the selling price was too low. Obviously some low selling prices had been accepted as a matter of policy in order to obtain the business, but in other cases it appeared that the buyer's buying had been keener than the seller's selling.

Practically every job for one of the largest customers appeared on this list. The director visited the managing director of the buying firm (which was completely satisfied with the promptness and quality of the work) and returned with a considerable price increase right through the range. The feeling before had always been 'we'd better not upset them, they're such good customers'.

In many other cases, of course, a price increase was not possible, but at least it was clear on which jobs re-orders could be accepted immediately, and on which a revised contract was necessary.

The summary of the data showed the following key information:

- (i) the number of machine-hours run (by machine-groups and in total);
- (ii) its relation to machine-hours planned;
- (iii) the contribution (at standard M.C.) (by machine-groups and in total);
- (iv) the contribution (at standard M.C.) per hour run and per hour planned.

It will be noticed that all these calculations and all this vital information resulted from the use of standard contributions. No attempt had yet been made to compare the actual cost of direct labour, materials, packing and transport with standards. Experience showed that there was likely to be less startling information available here, so the calculations were made monthly instead of weekly. Jobs were tabulated in the form shown at the foot of this page.

The totals of columns 3, 5 and 7 were compared with, respectively, the direct wages bill (indirect work and overtime premiums having been transferred to overheads accounts), direct materials used (from priced requisitions) and with the packing and transport account.

As payment was basically on piece-work, wages showed relatively small differences; the reason for any discrepancy was generally known.

Material price changes were known in advance, and differences in material usage resulted largely from differences in the scrap ratio. Inspectors made 'reject reports' and these were also evaluated in terms of contribution. The larger amounts were scrutinized to see whether their proportions were reasonable; the bad ones sometimes directed attention to machines, dies or operators.

One interesting result was a revision of the attitude towards scrap. There had been a tendency to regard

Job	Net quantity produced (in gross)	Standard labour cost per gross	Standard labour usage (1 × 2)	Standard material cost per gross	Standard material usage (1 × 4)	Standard P.&T. cost per gross	Standard P.&T. usage (1 × 6)

the percentage of scrap produced as something of prime importance, but it soon became clear that it was uneconomical to attempt to reduce scrap from, say, 5 per cent to 3 per cent if this meant slower operation to such an extent that the lost time (and therefore the lost opportunity to earn contribution) exceeded the cost of the additional materials and labour wasted. From being a magic yardstick, the scrap rate became just one of many considerations.

Packing and transport was very difficult to check, but as long as over a reasonable period of time it stayed relatively close to the calculated figure, it was not thought to be worth more than an occasional investigation.

Conclusion

This short article inevitably fails to cover all the complications which arise. For instance, some refinements were introduced to reflect greater or smaller use of ancillary operations or processes. Also, I have implied that any productive capacity saved could be profitably used automatically, merely by increasing sales, which of course is an over-simplification. The additional resources could, in fact, be used either for increased sales if these were available, or for eliminating unnecessary overtime or shift working, or to enable the least reliable machines to be scrapped, thus releasing space which could be used more profitably for other purposes, and so on.

I prefer to think of marginal costing as an approach which can often be very useful rather than as a 'costing revolution'. Throughout, the principle used is 'management by exception'; attention is constantly directed to all things which behave in a different (particularly worse) way from that anticipated. The responsibility for the differences must be identified, and the appropriate executive must accept this responsibility so that corrective action can be taken.

Many idols may be shattered – too many firms assume unquestioningly that the total value of their sales, the number of units made, or the scrap rate, are the yardsticks of success. If, as in this case, utilization – at proper margins – of available machine time is the key factor, the mere recognition of it may simplify managerial problems and thereby start to increase the company's prosperity.

The managing director of the company concerned is well satisfied that the definition of his key factor and its reflection through the direct costing system has played an important part in increasing profits.

Standardizing Invoice Design

Contributed

IMPROVEMENTS in the efficiency of office work have been given continuous attention over many years; and radical changes in methods of data processing and information retrieval have been made possible by work study and by the systems analysis essential to the economic integration of routines in computer programming.

Whatever procedure is surveyed, it is likely that at some stage a piece of paper will be used to convey information or instructions; and if the content or sequence of that information can be standardized the piece of paper will become a 'form'. Forms, it has been said<sup>1</sup>, provide a means for the smooth and efficient working of clerical procedure. A good form serves as a means of recording information in the logical and pre-determined layout most appropriate to the procedures which it serves.

In dealing with information wholly internal to an organization this ideal can be approached. Forms which transfer information between independent organizations still impede the use of the most efficient processing routines. Among such forms the invoice occupies a key position.

British Standard 1808, Part I, includes recommended layouts for commercial forms, including invoices. This was published as long ago as 1951 and revised in 1963. The recommended invoice layout is reproduced overleaf, and has been overprinted 'A', 'B', 'C' and 'D' to identify the main information fields.

1. Identifying the invoice

- (a) The title 'INVOICE' appeared on only 70 per cent of the sample.
- (b) An invoice number was given by 87 per cent only: 45 per cent printed it at the head of the form, as recommended;

7 per cent put it at the foot of the invoice, in field D.

- (c) The date of the invoice appeared in any position in fields A and B; and was not always readily distinguishable.

2. Tracing the originating order number

This was practically always quoted; but one supplier in five put it either in the description field (C) or at the foot of the form (field D).

The reason for including the order number in field C was usually that the invoiced items related to more than one purchase order; and that the invoice was a copy of the packing or advice note. It is open to query whether, with the growth of mechanized ledger posting, any great saving is achieved even by the supplier by using such multi-order documents.

3. Tracing receipt of the goods

- (a) Place of receipt. The company concerned operated several factories at which goods were received, but dealt with all correspondence and accounts centrally.

Fifty-five per cent of the invoices had provision in fields A or B for distinguishing the consignee from the addressee.

A further 30 per cent quoted the consignee's address; but it was necessary to search for it in fields C and D.

Fifteen per cent did not quote the address of delivery.

- (b) Date of dispatch was quoted by only one-third of the suppliers.

- (c) Method of transport was quoted by three-quarters of the suppliers; but of these only two out of three gave it in the recommended position in field B.

4. Terms of payment were quoted by 82 per cent:

40 per cent printed the terms in the recommended position at the foot of the form;

17 per cent put them in the reference field, B.

(This extract from British Standard 1808 Part 1: 1963, entitled Specification for Sizes and Recommended Layouts of Commercial Forms, is reproduced by permission of the British Standards Institution, 2 Park Street, London W1, from whom copies of the complete standard may be obtained.)

All the foregoing items of information, in addition to the quantity, description, and price of the goods, had to be identified in order to accept the invoice and approve it for payment.

Because punched cards were to be prepared from the invoices, it was also necessary to record certain of this information on a separate docket so as to avoid research time when punching.

The time taken for these operations was prolonged by the random positioning of the information on the invoices; and also by the fact that no invoice clearly distinguished those references which were of interest to the customer from those which were for internal use by the supplier (such as the supplier's internal order number, the customer's account number, the salesman, branch, or area reference, and the supplier's accounting period).

It may, somewhat cynically perhaps, be regarded as unfortunate that the selective employment tax does not penalize industrial clerical operations more heavily; nevertheless, the time may be opportune to suggest to accountants in industry, who have some influence over the design of forms, that their companies could help themselves and others to improve office efficiency by yet another look at the design of external paperwork.

Some Aspects of the Corporation Tax – I

Introduction

IT would no doubt be unfair to drama critics to expect them to review a play before they have seen the last act, although one suspects they sometimes do. Yet I feel I was placed in a similar predicament in being asked to write a paper on the corporation tax to a time-table which involves the delivery of the manuscript, as events have turned out, before the Finance Bill of 1966 has seen the light of day. Any amendments to the corporation tax legislation which the Bill may contain are therefore liable to render obsolete anything I have written, before it is read.

Following the passage of the Finance Act 1965, a spate of material was published with the object of interpreting to the professional and lay public, in more intelligible language, the obscure phraseology of the legislation. I am assuming that this initial assault has broadly achieved its main objective, and that what is now required is a series of mopping-up operations, designed to throw some more light into the dark corners of the Act which still seem to defy logical explanation, or the implications of which are not readily apparent. Obviously this cannot be done in one paper, or by one writer – certainly not by myself – but this paper is offered in the hope that if it does not provide a glimmer of illumination on the limited number of topics which I have selected to include in it, it will at least stimulate fruitful discussion on them. First of all, however, I would like to set down some general comments on the broader aspects of corporation tax.

Nothing new under the sun?

A corporation tax on company profits of 40 per cent, combined with the imposition of income tax at the standard rate of 8s 3d as a separate charge on the distribution of what is left, produces an effective rate of 40 per cent on retained profits, and 64½ per cent on those which are allocated to the payment of dividends. All but the younger members of the profession will recall that this kind of differentiation is no novelty in the taxing habits of successive Governments. Between 1947 and 1958 profits tax was levied at rates appreciably higher than those which have prevailed since, but with, as it were, a reward for good behaviour, in the shape of 'relief for non-distribution'. It may help to get the new scheme of company taxation into a proper perspective by rates on excesses over £2,000, up to £12,000. The mitigating effect of investment allowances, since 1954, have likewise been disregarded.

It may come as something of a surprise to be reminded that the current rate of tax on distributed profits, 64½ per cent, has been exceeded in the past, in peace time. This, as will be seen, was achieved by the late Mr Hugh Gaitskell, the last Labour Chancellor before Mr Callaghan, in his Budget of 1951, when the rate of profits tax on distributed profit was raised to the unprecedentedly high figure of 50 per cent. In those days profits tax ranked as a deduction from profit for assessment to income tax, so that in combining the two taxes one must allow for a partial cancelling out of the one by the other.

The present rate of tax on undistributed profits, 40 per cent, looks generously low in comparison with the past. This is an illusion, as will be seen when one takes into account the long-term effects of capital gains tax. The accumulation of retained profits will be one of the factors affecting the value of a company's shares during the holder's period of ownership, and when he comes to dispose of them, or to depart this life, it is, I think, a fair assumption that the company's profit retention will emerge as an element of the chargeable gain then arising. As a general proposition, this is perhaps arguable, but I believe it will prove to be valid in many instances, as, for example, in a liquidation. Where this is so, there will be superimposed on to the corporation tax borne by the company a charge of 30 per cent on the profit that is left, so that company and shareholder together will have suffered no less than 58 per cent tax on the undistributed profit originally earned. In this respect Mr Callaghan can expect in the end to do better than Mr Gaitskell, or any of his other predecessors.

The changes wrought in 1965 are, of course, not merely a matter of tax rates. Their effects on companies trading overseas, on overseas companies trading here, on shareholders not liable to income tax, as well as on many other classes of taxpayers are far-reaching. In particular, the new definitions of distributions are more sophisticated (where they are intelligible) than those which obtained under the two-tier profits tax rules, and are infinitely more so in their application to close companies. Moreover, a company in the latter class, however it may contrive to avoid making distributions, will nevertheless be taxed as if it had done so up to its so-called 'required standard'.

One of the mitigating features of the company surtax legislation was that where the whole of a company's income was apportioned to individuals, the company was removed from the scope of profits tax, so that profits tax and surtax became, in effect, alternative taxes, and the maximum rate (in 1965-66) was 91½ per cent. No such easement is provided by the new legislation. A company's profits may be subjected successively to corporation tax, income tax and surtax, so that in the end as much as 94½ per cent of them may reach the Exchequer, where the top rate of surtax is borne and where 100 per cent of the income is either distributed or subjected to apportionment.

Where, in the case of estate or trading income, no more than 60 per cent is required to be distributed, or treated as distributed, the cumulative effects of the different taxes are not so severe. The overall tax burden will range from 55 per cent to 73 per cent, depending on whether the shareholder is liable only to standard rate income tax, or to that and surtax as well up to the highest rate. Here again, the ultimate potential charge to capital gains tax on the undistributed part of the income should not be overlooked, and this will add a uniform 7·2 per cent to the tax that is immediately suffered. Even so, these rates compare favourably with what an individual in the higher ranges of surtax would bear, if the source of income were in his direct ownership. It looks as if a case can still be made out occasionally for the private property investment company. The question as to whether trades should now be carried on under corporate or non-corporate ownership is more complex, and is one which would justify a paper to itself.

The family investment company – the death knell, or 'business as usual'?

The private investment company and its continued usefulness in the new tax climate, has, I am sure, been the subject of anxious discussion over the past year. The problems that these companies present are no doubt as varied as the circumstances in which they exist, but at least one new feature will be common to all of them. A capital gain will be subject in a company's hands to corporation tax whether it is distributed or not, whereas an individual would be liable on the same increment (if it is a long-term gain) at the 30 per cent rate, or lower. Furthermore, the distribution of such a gain by a company will impose additional burdens on the shareholder in the form of income tax and surtax, which he would not bear if the gain had accrued to him personally.

The impact of the new tax structure on the income of such companies will vary according to the nature of that income. The case of property income has already been touched upon; there remains to be considered franked investment income, and that which is neither franked nor 'estate or trading income', e.g. loan stock interest, and dividends from foreign stocks.

For investments producing income in the latter category to be held by such a company, when they can be owned by an individual or trust, seems to offer no joy whatever. There is no escape from income tax or surtax, since the required standard of distribution will inevitably be 100 per cent. The corporation tax which this income will attract appears to be merely a voluntary additional contribution to the Exchequer.

Franked investment income does not suffer the same disadvantage, and possesses the advantage that it may provide the means whereby a company may obtain relief for management expenses, not available to an individual, in the form of an income tax repayment, under section 62. This form of relief will be lost, however, to the extent that the company possesses unfranked income, which must be used first to offset the management expenses.

In advising close investment companies and their proprietors on a course of action it is really not possible to generalize. A few may find that corporate status still has distinct advantages. Some may be at no serious disadvantage in the short run, but be faced with a mounting problem of potentially high taxation on gains as their investments appreciate in value. Many will already be finding life intolerable, and be seeking a way of escape. The most obvious one is, of course, liquidation, and some companies will have already taken this step, but by doing so a dual capital gains situation is created. In the first place, the company will be making a disposal of its investments, whether it sells them or distributes them in specie to its members. In the second, the members will be disposing of their shares in the company, as and when the liquidation proceeds are received, in cash or otherwise. The moral of this seems to be, the sooner it is done the better, since the longer the time that elapses between the 'base' date of April 6th, 1965, and the dates of the respective disposals, the more acute are these problems likely to become.

However, some thought should be given to the advantage, which the company as the present holder of an investment possesses, of choosing between cost and Budget day (1965) market value as the capital gains 'base', which advantage is lost after the asset in question has been transferred to a different ownership. If investments are standing at values below either of these alternatives, but are thought likely to appreciate to the higher level in the foreseeable future, a case may exist for deferring the transfer, or the liquidation itself, until this favourable moment arrives.

Commencement of corporation tax – a dilemma for the new company

Corporation tax commences to be chargeable on trading profits earned after the end of the basis period of the income tax assessment for 1965–66, or after the end of the basis period for 1964–65, if that is later. A company that commenced to trade at any time between April 6th, 1962, and April 5th, 1965, may thus postpone the date when it becomes chargeable to corporation tax, by electing to be assessed to income tax on a current-year basis for its second and third years of assessment. (If its second year is 1965–66 it may still make the election, even though the election will be inoperative for 1966–67.)

Ignoring the slight difference between the income tax and corporation tax rates, the benefit of making the election will be to eliminate or reduce the double or perhaps treble assessment of the same profits to income tax which invariably takes place after the commencement of a trade, when the preceding-year basis follows on from the current-year basis. However, this benefit may prove to be illusory, for it must be remembered that the postponement of the commencement of corporation tax inevitably means the prolongation of chargeability to profits tax. Consider the example in the adjoining column.

On the face of the figures shown it would appear disadvantageous to elect for adjustment of the second and third years' income tax assessments to 'actual'. However, account must now be taken of section 85 which (by means of a 'one-year surplus') allows dividends to be paid in 1966–67 without the necessity for having to account to the Revenue for the income tax deducted therefrom. Failure to elect will mean that this company has no entitlement to a one-year surplus, since it will have borne no income tax for 1965–66 on a current-year basis, and no profits tax for the corresponding period. By making the election, however, both these conditions will be fulfilled, and a one-year surplus will be produced, amounting to £5,515. In terms of tax, this will be worth £2,275 to the company, assuming that it intends to pay dividends in 1966–67 of at least £5,515 gross. This swings the balance of advantage in favour of making the election, although it is just possible that a different answer again would be produced after the end of 1968–69 should a 'three-year surplus' then be found to supersede the one-year surplus for section 85 purposes.

Should the company cease to trade before April 6th, 1971, it will come within the scheme of cessation relief provided for in section 87, but by making the election in respect of the second and third years the company will have deprived itself of all benefit from that section, since its assessments on the basis of a notional cessation at April 5th, 1966, will be identical with those that were actually made on it up to that date.

A company commenced to trade on October 1st, 1963. Its profits adjusted for income tax, and also for profits tax or corporation tax, were as follows:

Year to September 30th, 1964	..	..	..	£4,000
" " " 1965	..	..	..	16,000
" " " 1966	..	..	..	12,000

The alternatives with which the company is presented are as follows:

	No election		Election
	Assess- ment	Tax	Assess- ment	Tax
Income tax:	£	£	£	£
1963–64	.. 2,000	775	2,000	775
1964–65	.. 4,000	1,550	10,000	3,785
1965–66	.. 4,000	1,650	14,000	5,775
Corporation tax:
Twelve months to September 30th, 1965	.. 16,000	6,400	—	—
Twelve months to September 30th, 1966	.. 12,000	4,800 (6 mnths)	6,000	2,400
Total assessments to income tax and corporation tax	.. 38,000		32,000
Tax thereon	..	15,175		12,825
Profits tax:
Twelve months to September 30th, 1964 (subject to abatement)	.. 4,000	360	4,000	360
Twelve months to September 30th, 1965	..	—	16,000	2,400
Six months to April 5th, 1966	..	—	6,000	900
		£15,535		£16,485

One further consideration which may influence the decision is that the due date for payment of corporation tax will be brought forward by six months, if the election is made, and this disadvantage will seemingly persist throughout the trading life of the company. So long as the 1965–66 income tax assessment is on the preceding-year basis, the due date for payment of corporation tax remains January 1st, i.e. fifteen months after the end of the accounting period. But once the current-year basis is substituted in 1965–66, the nine-months' rule comes into operation, bringing the collection date forward to the preceding July 1st.

Enough has been said to show that the example given is not as simple as it looks, even though it consists only of three years' trading results, with no extraneous detail. Some comfort may be gained from the knowledge that, in the circumstances quoted, an election for second and third year adjustment may be made, or, if already made, revoked, at any time up to April 5th, 1972, by which time all the relevant considerations should be apparent.

The new system of accounting for income tax deducted from receipts and payments of interest, royalties, etc., began on April 5th, 1966, although the first settlements are not to take place until September. The position of a company which has borne income tax in this way by deduction from interest or similar receipts (not franked investment income) is worthy of a little study. Its first claim for recovery of the income tax is by way of offset against the income tax deducted from the payments of interest etc. (not being distributions) which the company has made during the same year of assessment. If that does not effectively recover all the income tax borne, the next source of relief is the corporation tax liability for the accounting period in which the receipt in question falls to be assessed, against which tax a credit is allowable for the income tax not already recovered. However, there may be an absence or insufficiency of corporation tax liability which prevents this. In that case the company will be entitled to claim repayment of the balance of the income tax it has suffered. It is not easy to find this spelled out in so many words in the Act, but this must be the implication of section 46 (2), which removes the income of a company from the charge of income tax for all years after 1965-66. Section 48 (6) supports this proposition in a somewhat negative fashion, by saying that the company shall not be entitled to a repayment of income tax before the relevant corporation tax assessment is finally determined and it appears that a repayment is due. Leaving aside the possibility of an appeal, the settlement of which may be long deferred, it would seem that the final determination of a corporation tax assessment cannot take place before the passing of the Finance Act which fixes the rate of corporation tax for the financial year in which the accounting period ends.

A company may claim a provisional offset of tax suffered by deduction from interest received, against tax deducted from distributions made by the company in the same year of assessment. This is the effect of the scheme of monthly settlements laid down in Schedule 12, for which purpose no distinction is made between payments which are distributions and those which are not. However, if distributions are used in this way the offset would be of temporary benefit only, since shortly after the following April 5th the company would be required under Schedule 12, paragraph 1 (2), to hand back the amount of the offset, either by agreement of the position with the inspector or by means of an assessment made for that purpose. Moreover, the calling in aid of distributions in this situation will have the effect of deferring by one year the company's ultimate right of recovery against corporation tax or by repayment, where the interest in question was received between April 5th and the end of an accounting period. Such is the purport, when it has been deciphered, of paragraph 4 of Schedule 12.

The manner in which the various forms of recovery take place may be traced through in the following example. During 1967-68 a company receives debenture interest of £1,000 on June 1st and December 1st, pays mortgage interest of £200 on May 1st and November 1st, and pays a dividend of £2,000 on January 1st, these amounts being gross in each case. It makes up its accounts annually to September 30th, and it incurred a trading loss of £300 for the year to September 30th, 1968. For the sake of simplicity, the rate of income tax is taken as 8s in the £, and any interest falling due after April 5th, 1968, is ignored.

The month-by-month cash settlements with the Revenue on account of income tax will proceed as follows:

		Gross	Tax deducted	Paid to/ recovered from Inland Revenue
1967:		£	£	£
May 1st	Interest paid ..	200	80	80
June 1st	„ received ..	1,000	400	80
Nov. 1st	„ paid ..	200	80	—
Dec. 1st	„ received ..	1,000	400	—
1968:
Jan. 1st	Dividend paid ..	2,000	800	160
	Paragraph 1 (2) liability, agreed after April 5th, 1968, paid, say, June 1st, 1968 ..			640
	Income tax accounted for to Revenue to date, being deductions from distributions in 1967-68 (there being no franked investment income) ..			£800

Corporation tax, accounting period twelve months to September 30th, 1968:

		£
Debenture interest received December 1st, 1967		1,000
Less: Trading loss .. .. .		300
		700
Less: Charge to income:
Mortgage interest paid November 1st, 1967		200
		£500
Assessable profit .. .. .
		£
Corporation tax at 40 per cent .. .. .		200
Income tax credit, £640, limited to .. .. .		200
		Nil

Since the corporation tax due for the September 1968 accounting period is less than the potential income tax credit by £440, this sum will become repayable when the assessment for that period is finally determined (say, in August 1969).

One can now summarize the time and manner in which the company recovers the income tax borne on its debenture interest in June and December 1967, £800 in all:

1967:		£
June	By repayment of tax previously accounted for on interest paid .. .. .	80
November	By retention of tax deducted from interest paid .. .. .	80
1968:
January	By partial retention of tax deducted from dividend paid .. .. .	£640
June	Handed back, Paragraph 1 (2), Schedule 12 .. .. .	640
1969:
August	By repayment .. .. .	440
1970:
January	By credit against corporation tax .. .. .	200
		£800

If the company had refrained from claiming the retention of tax deducted from the dividend in January 1968, it would be able to claim a credit of £320 against its corporation tax liability (assuming it to be at least as much as that) due on January 1st, 1969, in respect of its accounting period ending September 30th, 1967. Its right to a repayment in August 1969 would be diminished correspondingly.

Financial Analysis in Marketing

THE production and use of analytical data in relationship to manufacturing costs have been the subject of study and comment for many decades. Less so has been the use of financial analysis as an aid to marketing. It may be that production problems have been more readily in evidence in the past and, in Britain at least, the upheavals caused by the two wars have clouded to a certain extent the vital importance of marketing whilst emphasizing problems in production.

When one examines the relationship between functions in most businesses, it is apparent that the marketing function will tend to play a predominant role in the overall growth of the business. One may not go as far as some people in saying that the future structure of many businesses will consist of a single function – marketing – which will merely draw upon productive and financial services as required; but there is a large enough element of truth in this idea to justify a greater effort to develop more sophisticated methods of financial analysis in the marketing field.

Now, when the cold winds of competition are blowing, may be an appropriate time to look at areas in the marketing function which may be susceptible to financial analysis.

Areas susceptible to financial analysis

Analytical techniques developed for other purposes may well be adapted and modified for use in handling the following kinds of problem:

- (a) Statistical information on selling costs. Included here would be the apportionment of selling costs to products; analysis by geographical areas; measuring selling costs in relationship to the 'contribution'<sup>1</sup> derived from the sales they produce.
- (b) Cost/volume relationships. The relationships between total and marginal costs of selling and their effect on sales volume and 'contribution' (taken in total) by territories, and by individual products.
- (c) Effectiveness of sales media. Typical problems here would be selling through trade channels versus direct representation; direct selling versus advertising, assessing effectiveness of different types of selling and publicity.
- (d) Mix problems. What is the right mix of product to be selling – both from the 'contribution' point of view and selling costs.

Statistical Information

Statistical information on selling costs is frequently used as a basis for controlling the sales force and its deployment, although little seems to be written up on such techniques. The typical problem is whether or not a particular area merits representation. In such a situation there should be methods of analysing costs, both selling and manufacturing so that the contribution from additional sales resulting can be measured against the additional selling costs arising from such representation. With new territories, part of the selling costs may be taken out of such a calculation and treated as costs of establishing the business in that particular area.

The method by which a sales force is remunerated may have a considerable impact on sales. Payment of commission at a flat-rate on all sales may not be the best solution, and thought should be given to the fact that it is the marginal sales achieved by a salesman that are important and which are the most lucrative to the business. Complete or partial abolition of commission on the 'normal' turnover of the territory and its concentration on sales above this level, or on the margin, may be the answer. Again, statistical analysis of costs and revenue data will help to assess the effect of such changes if properly controlled experiments are conducted.

Cost/volume relationships

It is important that the relationship between total and marginal or variable costs of production and selling costs should be properly realized if any business is to reach optimum profitability. Where a company's turnover is already sufficient to cover fixed and variable manufacturing costs and fixed and variable selling costs, then any increase in sales will result in an increase in profit of the selling price less variable manufacturing and selling costs only. This means that the margin of sales price that may be devoted to securing those extra sales will exceed, in many cases by a substantial margin, the proportion that can be allowed on total existing sales. With suitable analytical techniques such relationships can be developed not only for the business as a whole but also for individual products and, as noted earlier, for sales territories or other geographical areas.

The way in which a business organizes its selling efforts may be of vital importance to the ultimate result. Here there are a number of alternatives from which to choose – direct selling, mail order, trade channels, etc., and these may be allied with various forms of promotional activities. Has the business chosen the right combination for its particular type of business? Are certain areas or classes of customer or product more suited to one method than another? Does the proportion of resources devoted to each product, area, or type of customer, bear a proper relationship to the sales achieved? These are essential questions to be answered if the business is to achieve the maximum efficiency commensurate with its expenditure on selling and marketing.

Product mix

Finally, the choice of the right product 'mix'. A company selling a number of different products will often be faced with the problem that some of its products are less profitable than others, or may actually appear to be losing money, and the amount of selling effort consumed by the different products may be quite disproportionate to the profitability of products.

Whether or not a product is profitable or not should not be determined by the relationship between selling price and total cost, but rather the difference between selling price and those costs that would cease if the product were to be dropped. Within this concept of profitability, the return from products should be compared with selling resources consumed. When these are disproportionate, then controlled experiments should be conducted to ascertain the effects of redeployment of selling effort.

Some case studies on the effect of redeploying selling resources are given by Charles H. Servin in an article entitled 'Marketing Profits from Financial Analyses' in the Financial Executive for May and the dramatic effect on profitability which such studies reveal should not be lost on British companies. Also given in the article is a scheme for analysing selling costs by product groups, account-size classes and sales territories, which is useful to those engaged in analysing selling costs for the first time.

Techniques such as marginal analysis, already widely practised in other fields, may be eminently suitable for the analysis of marketing problems and now is the time to recognize that the difficulties facing the marketing function in a business can be ameliorated by close co-operation between marketing and financial executives.

Delay in Decision Making

ONE senior executive used to have a simple way of dealing with the mass of correspondence (including bills) which awaited him every day at the office. He put it all, unread, into a drawer in his desk. At the end of the week he would take out the pile, shuffle it, remove the top ten items and deal with them. The rest would go back into the pile for the following week. Should anyone complain and say that they must have a decision on some important matter he would point out that the laws of chance ensured that everyone's turn would come. No one, he would add, could say that the system was anything but fair all round. (Moreover he knew that many of the items answered themselves in the long run.) If, however, someone became too importunate, he would produce the ultimate weapon. Any further attempt to jump the queue would result in that item being excluded from the next shuffle. This technique, he found was particularly effective with creditors' bills!

It is not the intention here seriously to advocate that this laissez-faire approach should be applied to decision making. But there is something to be said for allowing a planned period to elapse between the time when all the facts required to make an important decision become available, and actually taking a firm decision. This delay arises for two separate reasons. First, the need to test other persons' reactions to the scheme (i.e. flying a kite), and to give them time to adjust to the new ideas behind the decision before it is a fait accompli. Secondly, the need for the decision maker to have time to think the proposal over quietly himself.

This period will vary very much with the individual. Some – the gifted few – can see right away what they really want. For most of us considerable time to consider the implications of any important decision is essential. This is summed up in the phrase 'I'll need to sleep on it'. But what really is the mental process here? Is it just a question of thinking through the implications of the decision logically, or is there more to it than that?

It would seem that the implications are not all easily arrived at. There must be a good deal of emotion involved if the matter is of any importance. Some internal resistance will undoubtedly be met, and for a while a sort of conflict ensues before a satisfactory resolution is arrived at. Some recent writing on the subject of retained learning shows a parallel conclusion. The curve, showing the amount remembered when the original information given is purely factual and unemotional is somewhat as shown in Fig. 1, below.

The rate of forgetting is (as might be expected) at its greatest immediately after the information is given. Presumably the curve is also asymptotic to the 'time' axis.

The corresponding curve when the emotional content of the information is very high is shown in Fig. 2, below.

The 'kink' in the curve corresponds to that time, shortly after the information is given, when the individual reacts to some of the unpleasant thoughts consequent on the emotional involvement, by repression.

To return to the problem of time in relation to decision making. Undoubtedly the right timing of the decision must take into account the need that human beings have to work through all the emotional consequences. This applies both directly for the decision maker, and indirectly for the recipients – for they too have to face up to the idea and be in a position to modify it if it is utterly unacceptable, before the decision is final. Additionally there is the external time factor. From a practical point of view the general rule must be that the earlier the decision is made the better.

Perhaps in years to come all the information will be fed into a computer, including the emotional factors (and especially the personal decision delay time of the executive on whom the final responsibility rests). 'Optimum date for special board meeting to consider project', the print out will say, 'next Friday week'!

For Addressing and Data Printing

NEWEST of the Addressograph embossed-plate addressing machines is the Model 3500. The new machine has visual selective control, automatic selection from sixty primary classifications, nine-line writing capacity and 360 alpha-numeric characters can be printed from each master record plus auxiliary data. With a high output speed of as many as 36,000 alpha-numeric characters a minute, the 3500 has wide application to a variety of business paperwork and list compiling routines.

Whether the application is payroll, mailing, credit transfer, preventive maintenance, production control, and many others, the Model 3500 prints all repetitive data at high speed. And to facilitate form handling, there are calibrated front and side gauges with a generous work area to provide unobstructed space.

At the other end of the scale is the new Addressograph Model 550; it is one of the smaller, hand-operated machines in the Addressograph range and, by virtue of its versatility, it is suitable for application to many paperwork routines. Furthermore, because the Class 550 is constructed of fibre glass, it is sturdy and light in weight and offers the advantage of portability within the office.

Models in the 550 class are designed for operation with plastic master records or card-index master records, depending on the application. Models with a lister are also available. Both the master record and the carbon ribbon are located in the machine head; the master record is changed in a simple, speedy operation – alignment is assured and the carbon ribbon moves automatically, ready for the next record. Impressions from the embossed master records come off face upwards on documents or lists to facilitate reading by the operator.
